paved the causey or high-way with flint or pibble stone, from the Temple of Mars unto Bovilla: It and the sines of certain Publicans or farmers of the City, that were grakers and condemned, paid the charges. Then Papyrins held the great Assembly for election of new Consuls, and created Q. Estima Gurges the son of Maximus, and D. Junius Brutus Seevas, Consuls. Papyrins himself was chosen Praxtor. This year, so joious and fortunate in many respects, could hardly countervail and recompence with all other comforts, one only calamity, namely, a petilence and mortality, which consumed and devoured both town and country, Insomuch, as for thestrangeness and extremity thereof, it was held for a prodigious and portentous sign beyond all-course of nature, and reach of reason. Whereupon, the books of Sibylla were peried, to know out of them, what situe and remedy the gods would vouchsate to shew of this malady and misery. Wherein they found, I that the Image of Æsculapius must be sent for, from as far as *Epidaurus to Rome. But for that by year, reason that the Consuls were bused in the wars, nothing was done, but only one day bestowed wholly in supplications and devour Letanies, to the honour of the said god Æsculapius.

The Breviary of L. Florus to the Eleventh Book.

V Hen Fabius Gurges the Conful, had fought an infortunate battell ag ainst the Samnits, and the Senate were about to discharge and remove him from his Army; Fabius Maximus his father, befought them for his sake, notiooffer him that differace and dishonour. For rather than that (hould come to pasts, he promised to serve in person under his sonin quality of his Lieutenant. Which moved the Senate, and prevaled more than anything else. And he was his words master. For he went to the field, and by his means and good advice, the Corful his fon was fo well assisted, that he defeated the Samnits, triumphedover them, led captive before his triumphant Chariot C. Pontius, Lord General of the Samnits, and afterwards struck off his head. Whiles the City [of Rome] was pitious- M ly visited and afflicted with the plague, there were certain Embassadors addressed and sent to Epidaurus, for to translate the Image of Esculapius from thence to Rome, And instead thereof they brought away a great snake or serpent, which of it self embarked in their ship, and wherein they were verily perswaded, that the puissance and divine power of the said god was resident. And when they had conducted it with them by fea as far as to Rome, it went forth of its own accord, and fram to the Island within Tyberis, where it setled: and in that very place where it took land, they erected a Temple to Æsculapius. L. Posthumius, a Consular man [i.e. who had been Consul] having the charge of an Army, was condemned, and had a round fine fet upon his head, for that he emploied his fouldiers about lome work in one of his farms. The League was now the fourth time renewed with the Samnits, at their earnest suit and request. Curius Dentatus the Consul, after he had defeated and slam N the Samnits, vanquished the Sabins, who were revolted and rebelled, and received them under his obersance, triumphed twice during the time of one Consulhip. Three Colonies were creeted, and peopled, to wit, Castrum, Sena, and Adria. The three Triumvirs to sit upon capitall crimes werethen first created. A softing was holden, and a solemn Lustrum, wherein byjust account were numbred 273000 Citizens of Romans. The Commons, because they were deeply engaged in debt, in regard of grievous and long seditions and dissentions, retired in the end to Janiculum, from whence they were reclaimed and brought again into the City, by the means of Q. Hortenfius the Dittator, who died in the very time of his Magistracy. This book containeth moreover the exploits against the Volsinians, and alfothe Lucans, against whom it was thought good and ordained, to fand aid and succours to the Tyrrhenians.

7 Alerius Levinus the Conful loft the field against Pyrthus: by occasion principally that his fouldiers were terrified and amazed at the uncouth fight of the Elephants, After that battell when Pyrimis C viewed and beheld the dead bodies of the Romans, lying flain on the ground; he offerved and warked, that all their faces were turned toward the enemy affront. From thence he went forward spoiling and wasting all the way to Rome. C. Fabricius was sent unto him for to treat about the redemption and ran-(om of the prisoners: and was sollicited by the King (but in vain) to abandon the service of his own country. The foresaid prisoners were enlarged and sent home without paying any ransom at all. Cyneas was Sent as Embas ador from the King unto the Senat; who required, that the King his Master, for to end and compound all quarrels, might be received into the City and amity of the people of Rome: but when it was thought meet to debate and confult of this important matter, in a more frequent affembly of the Senators, Appius Claudius, who many a day had not intermedled with the affairs of State and Councill, presented himself in the Court among the Senators: where his opinion carried the matter clear away. D and Pyrrhus his demand was flatly denied. P. Domitius, the first Cenfor of the Commoners, held a Lu-Arum or survey of the City, in which were found 278222 Roman Citizens by the poll. A second field was fought against Pyrrhus, but with doubtfull event and ilue. With the Carthaginians, the alliance was renewed now the fourth time. When a certain fugitive traitor that ran from Pyrshus, offered to C.Fabricius the Consul for to poison the King, he was sent back again, and the treason was discovered to the King Over and besides, this book containeth the prosperous affairs inwar against the Tuscans, Lucanians, Brutians, and Samnits.

E DYrrhus passed the seas into Sicily. When among other products and seassfull tokens, the image of Jupiter in the Capitoll was overthrom and smitten down with lightning, the head thereof was recovered and sound again by the soot shaiers. Curius Beneaturs, as he was taking musters, sold in poir-slate the goods of one that would not answer to his name when he was called. He deseated Pyrthus after his return again out of Sicily into Italy; and forced him to avoid and depart once for all. Fabricius a Confor-adisor additionation of the Sendary soom P.Cornelius Rushius, one that had been Confol, for that he had in slover plate to the weight of ten pound. There was a Lustrum holden by the Consors, and therein were sound 2712 24 Citizens. A society and alliance was contracted with Ptolomy King of Reypy, Sextilia a prosessed with Min was convisted of maclames and fornication, and buried agaich. Two new Colonies were crested so with Ptolomia and Conso. A sleet of Carthaginians arrived to aid the Marmetinis by occasion whereof the league was broken. This book comprised has shot, the happy exploits againsh the Lucanians, Sammits, and Bratians: together with the death of King Pyrthus.

A Teilius Regulus she Conful slew [in Affrick]a serpent of a mighty and wonderful bigness, but with the exceeding loss of his souldiers. And after many encounters and battels with the Carthaginians, when the Senat by reason of his so happy conduct and management of the wars, sent no other to succeed him, he distatched his letters unto them and complained thereof: and among other pregnant reasons that he alledged for to have a successor to come unto him, this was one; That the little inheritance and living which he had suffred waste, by the default or lewdness of his bailists of husbandry. Meanwhiles. as if fortune had been disposed and sought means to shew a notable example in the person of this one man Regulus, as well of adverfity as prosperity, he was overthrown in plain field, and taken prisoner by Xan-M chippus, a renowned Captain of the Lacedemonians, whom the Carthaginians had waged, and sent for to aid them. After this the fundry shipwracks of the Roman Navy, ecclipsed solfcured, and dusigned all the other exploits that the Roman Captains had fortunatly atchieved before, as well by land as sea. T. The one and twentieth book of T. Livius.

He same may I well say, in the Praface and entrance of this one part of my work, which most writers of histories have promised and made protession of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write the most famous and memorable war that ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Annibal fought with the people & State of Rome. For neither any other Cities or Nations are known to have warred together more wealthy and puissant than they; nor at any time ever were they themselves so great, so I strong in forces, and so mighty in means, as now they were. Moreover, they came not newly now. to wage war, without knowledge of the prowefs and martiall skill, one of another; for trial they had made thereof infficient already, in the first punick war. Besides, so variable was the fortune of the field, so doubtfully were their battels fought, that neerer loss and danger were they, who in the end won the better, and atchieved the victory. And to conclude, if a man observe the whole course and proceeding of these their wars, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: whiles the Romans took foul fcorn and difdain that they, whose hap before was to be vanquished should unprovoked begin war afresh with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians were as male-content, and throughly offended, as taking themselves (notwithstanding they were overcome) to be abused too much at their hands by their proud, infolent, and coverous rule over K them. Over and besides all this, the report goeth, that Annibal being but nine years old, or thereabout, came fawning and flattering as wanton children do to his father Amilear, that he would take him with himinto Spain, at what time, as after the Affrican war ended, his father was offering facrifice, ready to pals over thither with an army: where he was brought to the altar fide, and induced to lay his hand thereupon, and to touch the facrifice, and fo to iwear, that fo foon as ever he wereable, he would be a professed and mortal enemy to the people of Rome. Vexed (no doubt) at the heart, was Amilear himself, a man of high spirit and great courage, sorthe loss of the Mands Sicily and Sardinia: for not only Sicily was overhaltily yielded (as he thought) as defoairing too foom of the state thereof, and doubting how it should be defended: but also Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practice of the Romans surprized out of the Carthaginians hands, L whiles they were troubled with the commotion and rebellion of Affrick; and a Tribute besides. imposed upon them. He being disquieted, I say, and troubled with these griefs and discontents so base himself for five years space in the Affrick war, which insued immediatly upon the peace concluded with the Romans; and likewise after, in Spain, for nine years together, enlarging ever still the dominion of Carthage; that all the world might fee, heintended and defigned a greater war than that he had in hand; and if God had spared him longer life, it should have been well seen that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilear, would have made that war upon Italy, which afterward they waged by the conduct of Annibal. But the death of Amilear happing in so good season [forthe Romans] and the childhood and tendernonage of Amibal together, were the cause that this war was put off and deferred. In the mean time, between the father and the son, Asdrubal M bare all the rulefor the space almost of eight years. This Astrubal had been Amilear his minion. grown highly into his grace and favour, at the first (as men say) for the very prime and flower of his youths but afterwards, in regard of the fingular towardness of a brave and haughty mind, which foon appeared in him, and for his forwardness to action, he was preferred to be his fon in law, and married his daughter. Now, forasmuch as he was Amilear his son in law, he was advanced to the soveraign conduct of the war, with no good liking at all and consent of the Nobility and Peers, but by the means and favour only of the Barchin faction, which bare a great stroke, and might do all in all, among the fouldiers and the common people. Who managed all his affairs, more by policy and fage counfell, than by force and violence : and using the authority and name of the Princes and great Lords of those countries, and by entertaining friendship with the chief N Rulers, won daily the hearts of new nations ftill, and by that means enlarged the power and feignory of the Carthaginians in Spain, rather than by any war and force of arms. But for all this peace with forrein States, he was never the more fure of his own life at home. For a certain barbarous fellow, for anger that his Master and Lord was put to death, slew him in open place: and being laid hold on by them that were attendant about Afdrabal his person, he kept the same countenance still, as if he had escaped and gone clear away : yea, and when he was by cruell torments all full constancy mangled and torn, he looked so cheerfully and pleasantly on the matter, as if he had seemed to and resolution smile a leafur his joy of heart surpassed the pains and anguish of his body. With this Astrabal, for that he had so singular a gift and wonderfull dexterity, in solliciting and annexing unto his dominion the nations aforefaid, the people of Rome had renewed the League, upon these two capitulati-O

Afdrubal, the favour of the people would go clear with the prerogative voice and choice of the fouldiers: who presently brought young Annibal into the Generall his pavilion, and with exceeA ding great acclamation and accord of all, saluted him by the name of Captain General. For this you must understand, that Afdrubal by his letters missive had sent for him, being very young, and hardly fourteen years of age; yea, and the matter was debated first in the Council-House at Carthage, where they of the Barchine fide laboured and followed the matter earnestly, that Amilear the Annibal should be trained in warfare, and grow up to succeed his father in equall provels & great-father of Annineis, But Hanno the chiefe man of the contrary faction; "It is but meet and reason (quoth he) of Bartha, from "that Aldrubal doth demand: and yet formine own part I think it not good, that his request wheree arose Should be granted. Is this the thing we fear, That the fon of Amilear should tarry too long ere

" he see the excessive grandeur and soveraignty of his father, and the stately shew as it were of his "royalty? Or doubt we, that we shall not soon enough serve in all dutifull allegeance his natu-" rall fon,unto whose son in law, all our Armies have been left (as it were) in lawfull right of in-"heritance? Nay, I am of opinion, and this is my judgment, That this youth be kept in awe at c "home, under obedience of laws, under civil Magistrates, and learn a while to live in equal conco dition with the rest of the Citizens and subjects: for fear lest at one time or other, this little " fpark do burn outright, and raise a mighty flame. A sew, and those were, in a manner, all of the best fort and soundest judgment, accorded with Hanno. But, as commonly it is seen, the greater number over-weighed the better.

Thus Annibal was fent into Spain, and immediately at his first coming, drew all the whole army after him; so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old souldiers beleeved verily that Amilear was alive again, and come amongst them: they thought they beheld and saw the same vigour and spirit in his countenance & visage, the same quickness and liveliness in his eyes, the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had so n wrought and wound himself into their favour, that the late rememembrance of his father was the least matter of all others, that won him grace and love among them. Never was there one and The naturall the felf-fame nature, framed and fitted better, for two things that are in quality most contrary; namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly differn and judge, whether he was more dear unto the General for the one, or to the Army for the other. For neither Aldruba! would make choice of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed: nor the fouldiers put more confidence in any other Leader, nor go more boldly and resolutely to any enterprise, than under him. Most forward he was and hardy to-all hazards Havertues, and dangerous adventures: right provident and wary again, at the very point of perill and jeopardy. No travell was able to weary and tirehis body: no pains-taking could daunt and break This heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet and feeding, he measured both his meat and drink by his naturall appetite, and not by pleasure and delightsome taste. For sleepping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once performed his service, and finished his exploit; if there were any spare time after, therein would he take his rest and repole: and that should not be upon a soft bed neither, nor procured with great curiosity by still filence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good fouldiers jacket and homely cassock cast over him, even among the sentinels and corps de guard. For his apparel, it was not more costly nor braver than his sellows and companions: mary, in his armour and horses he loved ever to be goodly be-seen above all other. Amongst footmen and horsemen both, he would alwaies be a great way formost. And to F conclude in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin to battell, he was by his good will ever the first and when the fight was done, the last man feen to retire out of the sie'd. Of these so noble qualities and manly vertues, he had not so many, but there were asgreat vices and imperfections in him again, to counterpoife the same. under General Afdrubal. During which time, he omitted and forgat no one thing that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himself another day to be a Captain and chief Commander in the wars. From the very first day that he was chosen and declared Lord Ge-@ nerall; as if at the same instant, Italy had been the Province assigned unto him, as if, I say, he had received Commission to war with the Romans, bethought good to make no delaies, for fear lest haply whiles he lingred and flacked the time, some mischance might prevent his designs and cut him short, like as it had overtaken his father first, and Afdrubal afterwards: but present a A people determined to make war upon the Saguntines, by attailing whom, the Romans no doubt were touched, and would take arms and enter into the quartel. But first he led his army into the marking dom of Toledo in Spain. determined to make war upon the Saguntines, by affailing whom, the Romans no doubt were within the ches of the a Oleades (a nation beyond Iberus, rather fiding and taking part with the Carthaginear the City mians, than under their jurisdiction) that he might not seem to have shot at the Saguntins and Oceana

intended ought against them directly: but that by order and course of his affairs, after he had! fubdued the countries bordering upon them, he had been drawn (as it were) for vicinity and neighbourhood take to that war, and to joyn them also with the rest unto the Empire. And first he wan by force, and tacked b Cartein, a rich City, the leat town and chief place of all that nation Whereupon, other meaner and smaller Cities also, for fear came under his obedience, and vielded to pay tribute. His Army then after these victories, and enriched with spoil and pillage, was brought back to new . Carthage, there for to winter. Where he made fure unto him the hearts and affectionate love, as well of his own countrymen as of the allies, partly, by bestowing the pillage liberally among them, and partly, by making true paintent of fouldiers wages for the time paft. And then in the very prime of the spring he went forward to war upon the a Vaccei. He for- I ced by affault e Hermandica and Arbacula, two Towns of the ! Cartei, Arbacula by the manhood and multirude of the Townsmen held out a long time. But certain sugitives that were sled from Hermandica having rallied themselves, and joyned with other exiled persons of the Olcades, a nation the jummer before jubdued, raised also the g Carpetans to take arms: and set upon Annital, in his return from the Va :cei; and not tar from the river b Tagus, troubled and dilordred his march, heavily charged with spoil and booty. Annibal forbare to fight, and encamped himself upon the bank of the river: and to toon as the enemies were in their first sleep, and all still and husht, passed over with his Army at the foord: and after he had pitched his Camplo far off from the river fide, as that his enemies might have room enough to march away befides him. he determined to fet upon them as they should pass over the river: To his horsemen he gave com- K mandment to charge upon the Regiment of footmen, fo foon as they perceived them to have taken the water: and upon the bank he arranged forty Elephants afront them. There were of the Carpetans, counting the aids and fuccours of the Oleades and Vasces, 1 00000 frong: an Army invincible, if they had fought on even and indifferent ground. Who being both by nature fierce and couragious, and for mustitude confident; prefumptuous besides upon their imagination that the enemy was retired for fear; supposed that the only stay of their victory was, because the river ran between: and fetting up a shout and out-cry, without direction of any Leader in all diforder they ran into the river here and there, every man what way was next him. Now from the other fide of the bank, a great troop of horiemen were entred into the river, encountred them in the midit of the channel, and fought with great advantage. For whereas the footmen uniteady & and not able to keep fast footing, and hardly trutting the foord, might easily be cast slide and overturned, even by naked horsemen, if they did but put forth and prick forward their horses it skilled not how the horsemen on the other side having their bodies at liberty, and able to wield their weapon, with their horses under them standing sure even in the midst of the stream and whirlpools might with ease either fight close hand to hand; or affail the enemies aloof. Many of them befides perified in the water fome by the whirling waves of the river were driven upon the enemies, and by the Elephants trodden under foot, and crushed to death. The hindmost, who might with more fafety recover their own bank, after they were railied together into one from divers places; as fear had feattered them; before they could upon fo great a fright, take heart and come again to themselves, Annibal who with a four-square battaillon had entred the river, forced to ! tile from the bank: and when he had wasted the country, within few daies brought the Carpetans also under his obedience. And now all beyond Iberus was subject to the Carthaginians, the Saguntins only excepted. With whom as yet he would not feem to war: howbeit, to minister some cause and occasion attempted; but rather that they should attend the return of the Embassadors out of Spain: and this advice that feemed most safe, was held for the better and took place. And therefore so much the sooner were these Embassadors P. Valerius Flaceus, and Q. Bebius Pamphilus, addressed unto Annibal before Saguntum, with direction, from thence to go forward to Carthage (in case he would not defift and give over war) and for to demand the Captain himlelf, for amends and fatiffaction of breaking the league. But whiles the Romans were amused about these consultations &

thereof, quarrels were picked, and feeds of diffentions fown between them and their neighbors, namely the * Turdetans. Unto whose aid, when he was come, that was himself the sower of all * Algarbia, the variance, and had fet them together by the ears; and when it appeared plainly that it was not a matter of right to be tried by law, but an occasion rather fought of fight and open war; then the Saguntins fent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave aid against that war, which doubtless was at hand. The Confuls at that time of Rome, were P. Cornelius Scipio, and Tiens Sempronius N Longus, who having brought the Embassadors into the Councill House, and proposed matters unto the LL, there, concerning the weal publike, and decreed to fend their Embassadors into Spain to take furvey, and looh into the state of their allies: who also if they thought it meet, should give Annibal warning, not to meddle with their confederats, and molest the Saguntins; and withall, to fail over to Carthage into Affrick, and there make relation of the complaints and grievances of the allies of the people of Rome: when, I say this Embassage was decreed, but yet not fent news came fooner than all men looked for that * Saguntum was already befieged. Then * Morvedre. was the matter propounded new again before the Senare, Some were of mind to dispatch the Confuls unto the Provinces of Spain and Affrick, with commission to make war both by fea and land. Others thought better to bend all their forces wholly into Spain against Annibal. There were 2- O gain of opinion, that so great and weighty an enterprise was not hand, over head, and rashly to be

A decrees, Saguntum was by this time with all forcible means affaulted. This City of all other most Saguntum bewealthy and rich, flood beyond Iberus, fittiate almost a mile from the sea. The inhabitants are sieged by Anfaid to have had their beginning out of the Hland * Zacynthus : and some among them, were descended from Arden, a City of the Rutilians: but they grew within short time to this puissance and wealth of theirs, partly, by the fruits and revenews of their lands, and partly, by the traffick and gain of their merchandile, and commodities transported by sea, as also by the great affluence and encrease of people, and lastly, by their straight rule of discipline, whereby they observed their troth and loyalty with their allies, even to their own ruine and finall destruction. Annibal after he had invaded their confines as an enemy, and by way of hostility, with his Ar-

R my overrun and wasted their countrey, besieged and assailed the City three waies. There was one canton or angle of the wall shooting out into a more plain and open valley, than any other place all about: against which he meane to raife certain mantlets or fabricks, under which he might approach with the Ram to batter the wall. But as the place far from the wall, was even enough and handsome for such engins of battery to be driven upon: so after that they came to the proof and execution indeed the success answered nothing to the enterprise begun. For besides that there was a mighty tower over-looked and commanded them, the wall it felt (as in a place doubted and fulpected) was more fortified and raifed higher there than elfewhere: and also the chosen youth and ablest men were bestowed to make more forcible resistance, where there was like to be most trouble and danger. And first with shot of darts and quarels, and such like, they put the enemy back, and would not fuffer the pioneers and labourers in any place to entrench or raife rampiers in lafetv. In process also, they shot not from the wall only and that tower, and shewed themselves there in arms for defence, but also their hearts served them to fally forth, and to break into the guards of the enemies, yea, and to enter upon their trenches and fabricks. In which skirmishes there died not many more Saguntins than Carthaginians. But io foon as Annibal himfelf, approaching unadvisedly under the wall fortuned to be wounded grievously in the forepart of his thigh, with a dart or light javelin, and therewith fell to the ground ; they all about him fled to fast, and were so scared, that they had like to have given over quite and abandoned their mantlets, and other fabricks aforesaid. After this, for some sew daies, whiles their General was under cure of his hurt, they lay at siegerather, than followed the assault. In which mean time, as they rested from skirmish, so they ceased not to invent new devices, and to prepare new fabricks. Whereupon the alfault began again more hot than before: and in many parts at once they fell to raife rolling mantlets, so many and so thick, that some places would not receive them; and withall to drive the Ram against the walls. Annebal had men good store, for it is thought he was 1,50000 in Camp strong, The townsmen with devising means to defend, and see to every place, began to have their hands full: but all would not ferve, For now were the walls bearen with the rams, and many parts thereof shaken and battered: and at one place above the rest, by continual battery there was in h a breach, as the town lay open and naked to the enemy. After that, three turrets, and all the wall between fell down with a mighty and horribly crash, insomuch as the Carthaginians thought verily that with that rush the town had been won: by which breach, as if the wall had protected both E parties before, they ran forth together on each fide to fight. The battell was not like to a tumultuary skirmish, such as are wont to be about assaults of Cities, by the occasion and advantage of the one part or the other; but a very fet and ranged field (as it were) in an open ground between the breaches of the wall, and the houses of the town, that flood a pretty way distant within. Of one fide they were pricked forward with hope, on the other with despair; whiles Annibal thought werily that he was matter of the town already if he held on but a little longer; and the Saguntins feeing their town bare, and void of wals, opposed their bodies in the breach, not onestepping back a foot, lest in the space between he should let in the enemy. The more secrely therefore, and the thicker and cloter that they fought together on both parts, the more were wounded; and there was not a dart could light in vain between their bodies and their armour, but it did mif-F chief. The Saguntins used a weapon called Falarica, in manner of a dart, which they let fly and The description lanced from them, having a long shaft or steel, round and even every where toward the one end, or datt called where it was headed with iron, and bound about with tow, and imeared with pitch. The iron Falarica, head was three foot long, that it might pierce both harness and body through. But the greatest scare that it did was this, although it stuck fast in the target, and entred not into the body, that being driven and flung, when the middle part was fet on fire, by the motion thereof as it flew, it gathered much more fire, forced the fouldier to forlake his armour, and exposed him disarmed and naked to the shot following. Well, the fight continued doubtful a long time, by reason that the Saguntins took better heart unto them, because they had rested beyond their hope and expectation: and the Carthaginians took themselves vanquished, for that they had not got the victo-Gry, and better hand: whereupon, the townsmen all at once set up a cry, and beat the enemies back to the very breaches, and ruins of the wall, and from thence thrust them out clean, whiles they were thus encumbred and affrighted, yea, and at last discomfitted them, put them to flight, and chafed them as far as their Camp.

In the mean while newscame, that there were Embassadors arrived from Rome: unto whom Annibal dispatched certain messengers to meet with them at seaside, and to give them to understand, That neither they might safely with security of their persons come among the broiles of so many barbarous & fierce nations; nor their Master Annibal amidst those dangerous and tronblesome affairs, had any leisure to attend or give audience unto embaffages. He knew full well, H that the Embassadors being not received and entertained, would straight to Carthage. Whereupon, headdressed aforehand his letters and curriers to the chief of the Barchine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that fide, so, as they of the other part might not gratifie, or do any thing in favour of the Romans, By which means, befides that they were neither admitted by Annibal, nor audience given them, that embassage also was in vain, and took no effect at Carthage. Only Hanno notwithstanding the whole body of the Senate was against him, spake with great silence and affent of the hearers by reason of his authority and reputation, and pleaded to the point of the breach of League, in this wife: "I have quoth he, foretold and warned you in the name "and for the love of the gods, who are the witnesses and judges of covenants and confederacies, I "I have I fav, admonished you, that we should not send Amilear his son, or any of his breed unto "the Camp: for that neither the shoft and spirit, nor the progeny and race of that man can rest " and be quiet; nor the Roman league will ever be affured and established, so long as there rea mained one alive of the Barchine name and family. But fent ye have, for all my words, unto covour armies, a youth boiling in ambition enflamed with a covetous defire of being a King, and one that feeth no other way thereto, but by raising one war after another, to live guarded with "armies and legions about him. In which action of yours, ye have as it were ministred dry fewel, s' and out oilto the fire; ye have, I fay fed that fire wherewith ye now all are fet a burning. Your "armies now befiege Saguntum, from which by covenant and vertue of the League they are de-"barred. Within a while and shortly will the Roman legions lie in siege before Carthage; under K the conduct and guidance, no doubt, of those gods, by whose support and aid in the former war, they were revenged for the breach of the accord and alliance. What? know yet not yet, either "your enemy, or your felves, or the fortune of both nations? This good Captain and gentle Ge-" peral for footh, of your making, would not admit and receive into his Camp Embassadors com-"ing from our allies, and in the behalt also of our allies: wherein he abolished the law of Nations. "Howbeit, they having taken a repulse, from whence even the very Embassadors of enemies, are " not wont to be repelled, are come unto you, and by vertue of their League demand amends of "trespais and restitution or satisfaction for their damages. And presuppose the State be not tou-"ched nor culpable in this Action, they require no more, but to have the author himself in person, "who is the offender. The more gently they deale, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more L "obstinat they will be, and continue with greater rigour (I fear me) if they once begin, Set before Gotha,or Fas Co your eyes the Islands * Egates, and * Eryx: and what for these four and twenty years past, ye have endured both by land and fea. Neither was this beardless boy our Captain then, but his father Amilear himself, even a second Mars, as these his supposts would have him. But what of that? We could not then according to our league, hold our hands, and let Tarentum in Italy a-"lone; like as now we are doing with Saguntum. Therefore, both God and man took the matte ter in hand, and vanquished us in the end: and when we were at arguing and debating the case with discourse of words about this point. Whether Nation of the twain had broken the league? the event of war, as an indifferent and equall judge, awarded victory where the right was, And Carthage it is, against which, Annibal even now hath reared mantlets, towers, and other engins M name, Trapani, " of affault : even now, battereth and shaketh he Carthage wals with the Ram. The ruins of San " quntum (God grant I be a false Prophet) will fall upon our heads, and the war begun with the Saguntins, we must maintain against the Romans, How then? (will some man say) shall we yield Annibal unto them? I know well how small my authority is in this point, by reason of the old grudge and enmity between me and his father deceased. Howbeit, as I rejoyced, that Amilear "was dead, for that if he had lived fill, we should ere now have warred with the Romans: so this " very youth, an impe of his, I hate and deteft as the very fury and fire-brand of this war: whom "I would have by my good will, not only to be rendred unto them, for to purge and explate the "breach of league; but if no man would challenge him for to be punished, I would award that he " should be carried and transported as far as there is sea or land, and to be sent away thither from N whence we might not once hear of him again, and where he might never trouble the quiet and "peaceable state of this City any more. Over and besides, my opinion and resolution is, that some "Embaffadors be fent prefently to Rome, to fatisfie the Senate and others also, with a mefface to " Annibil that he withdraw his forces from Saguntum: and with commission to render up Anni-"bal himself into the Romans hands, according to the tenour of the League: and a third Embas-"(fage likewife to the Saguntins, for to make restitution and amends for their harms and losses al-"ready fustained. When Hanno had made an end of his speech, it was altogether needless, that any one man there should make reply, and debate the matter with him by way of Oration, the whole Senate was to possessed already and wrought for Annibal: and with one voice they blamed Hanno, and founded if out, That he had made a bitter speech, and more savouring of an enemy, O than Flaceus Valerius himself the Roman Embassador. After this, the Roman Embassadors had this answer returned. That the war began by the Saguntins, and not by Annibal. Also, that the people of Rome offered them injury, in preferring the Saguntins before the most ancient alliance of the Carthaginians. Whiles the Romans thus spent time in lending Embassages, Annibal having wearied his men, what with skirmishes, and what with trenching and raising mounts and sabricks, he gave them reft fome few daies and bestowed certain good guards to ward and keep the mantiets and ot her engins of battery. In the mean feafon he encouraged his fouldiers, and fer their

ly, by drawing them on, and alluring them with hope of great rewards. But after he had once in a general affembly made proclamation. That the spoil and pillage should be the souldiers share; they were all so enkindled and enflamed, that if presently he had sounded the signal of battel, it feemed, that no force in the World had been able to refift them. The Saguntins, as they had fome reft from skirmish, and continued certain dayes, neither assailing nor assailed: so they gave not over labouring night and day, for to make up a new wall and counter-mure, on that tide of the Town which lay open by reason of breaches. But after this, grew the assault morehot and furious than before: neither wift they well (the shouts and alarms were so divers and dissonant on Bevery fide) whether to come first, or where was most need of help and succour. Annibal himself was present in person to encourage and exhort his souldiers, where as the rouling Tower was driven which was so high, that it overlooked all the mures and counter-Fabricks of the City, and being once approached neer the walls, furnished as it was in every lost and story, with ordnance of quarrel shot, brakes, and other artillery, beat the defendants from off the walls, so as none durst abide upon them. Then Annibal taking the time, and supposing that he had now a good opportunity presented unto him, sent about 500 Affricans that were pioners with pick-axes, mattocks and such like tools, to undermine the wall yea, and to dig into it from the very foundation. And that was no hard matter to do, for that the cement or morter was not hardned and bound with lime, but tempered with earth and clay, after the old manner of building: and therefore the wall C came tumbling down before it was hewn and wrought into: and through the widebreaches, whole troops of armed fouldiers entred the Town: and withal, they feized one high place above the rest, whereon they planted their attillery and ordnance of slings and brakes, and cast a wall about it, that they might have within the very Citya fort and baltillon of their own, like a Castle to overlook all. The Saguntins likewise raised another mure within along that side where the Town as yet was not taken; So that on both fides they made fortifications, and also fought with all their might and main. But the Saguntins defending the inner parts; by little and little brought their Town daily into a smaller compais. And by that means, as also by reason of the long fiege, as scarcity and want of all things grew more and more so the expectation of forrain aid and inccour was every day less than other: the Romans their only hope, being so far off, and their D enemies to neer on every hand. Howbeit, the fudden rode and journey of Annibal against the * * The inhabit Oretans and "Carpetans, refreshed for a while their troubled and afflicted spirits, These two Na- tants of Ole-Oretans and Carpetans, remement of a write their troubles and annoted spirits, a new two law trans. But the assault of Saguntum continued nevertheless. For Maharbal, Himileo his son whom Annibal had lest behind as Lieutenant, fo bestirred himself, that neither the Townsmen nor the enemy found the mils or absence of the General. This Maharbal had made some fortunat skirmishes, and with three rams shaken a good part of the wall, so as he shewed to Annibal at his return, all lying along E and every place full of fresh ruins. Whereupon the army was presently brought against the very Castle of the City, where began a cruel and bloudy conslict, with the slaughter of many on both fides, and one part of the faid fortrels was forced and won-Afterwards there was some treaty of peace and agreement, by means of two persons, Alcon a Saguntine, and Alorem a Spaniard, and some small hope there was of it. Alcon supposing he could somewhat prevail by way of request and entreating, without knowledge of the Saguntins, departed away by night to Annibal. But after that he faw, that with all his weeping he could do no good, but that heavy and intolerable articles and capitulations of peace were exhibited, as from a wrathful conqueror, of an Orator, proved to be a very traytor, and remained ftill in the camp with the enemies; faying, that he was fure to die, who foever should move the Saguntins to peace, r under tholeconditions. For demanded it was of the Saguntins, Imprimis to make refliction to the Turdetans of all harmes and loffes. Item, to deliver up all their gold and filver. Item, to quit the Town, and depart but with one fute of apparel a piece; and there to dwell, where the Carthaginians would appoint. When Alcon avouched plainly, that the Saguntins would never accept of peace with these conditions, Alorous replied again and said, That seeing all things elle now failed them, their hearts also must needs come down, and fail like wife; and sherewith promised to deliver unto them the tenor of the faid peace, and to be a mediator and dealer in the compaifing thereof. At that time he ferved Annibal as a private fouldier: howbeit, a publick friend he was, and an holt and guest of old to the Saguntins. Who having in fight of all men yeelded up his offensive arms, to the warders of the enemies, and passed the rampiers, was brought (for so him-G felf defired) before the Governor and Provost of Saguntum. Thicher came running presently, a number of all forts of people : but after the reft of the multitude were commanded to void, Alorons was called into their Councel house; and having audience given, made this or the like speech untothem, " If Alcon your countryman and fellow citizen, as he came from you to Annibal for The Oration " to treat about peace, had likewise brought back again unto you from Annibal the conditions of Alorus a

For mine own part, I am not out of hope, but when you have put all into his hands, he es will deal better by you, and remit iomewhat of these conditions. But I think ye were better to "abide all this, rather than your bodies to be murdred, your wives and children to be ravished, " haled and forced before your faces, as the law and manner of war requireth.

To the hearing of this Oration the people had flocked about, and by little and little entermingled their own affembly with the Senators: and all of a fudden the chief of them withdrew themselves and departed, before answer was given: and brought all their filver and gold, as well publick as private, into the market place: and when they had cast it into a great fire made hastily L for that purpole, most of them threw themselves into it headlong after. Whereupon there being a fear and trouble already throughout the whole City: behold, another outcry befides and noise was heard from the Caffle. For a certain Tower that had been a long time battered and shaken, fell down; fand at the breach thereof, a band of Carthaginians made entry, and gave fign to their General that the City was abandoned of the ordinary Watchmen and corps de guard of the enemies, and altogether lay open and naked. Annibal supposing it was no wisedom to neglect and flack fo good an opportunity, with all his forces at once affailed the City, and wan it in the turning of an hand: and prejently gave order that all above fourteen years of age should be put to the fword. Acruel commandment, no doubt, but yet needful, as afterwards it was well feen in the end and upfhot of all. For who would have spared and taken pity of those, that either shut them-M selves with their wives and children into their houses, and burnt them over their own heads, or in their armor. gave not over fight before they died? Thus was the Town won with exceeding flore of pillage within it. And albeit much was spoiled on purpose by the owners, and that in the massacre and execution they had no respect of age in the sury of their anger : and for all that,

that from thence Annibal departed to winter in new * Carthage: as also, that the fifth month after he departed from Carthage, he arrived in Italy. Which being to, it cannot be, that P. Cornelius N and T. Sempronius should be the Consuls, unto whom both in beginning of the siege, the Saguntin Embaffadors were fent; and who also in their year of government fought with Annibal, the one neer the river * Ticinus, and both together a good while after, at * Trebsa. And we must say, that either all these things were atchieved in shorter time agood deal, or else that Saguntum in the beginning of that year, wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Confuls, began not to be befieged; but finally was forced and won. For the battel at Trebia could not be fo long after, as to fall in the year wherein Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius were Confuls. For that Flaminius entred his Consulship at Ariminum, and was created by T. Sempronius, Consul, who after the battel of Trebia came to Rome to elect Confuls, and after the Election was ended returned again to his army, into the wintering harbours.

About the fame time, as well the Embassadors which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but war: as also tidings came, of the destruction of Saguntum. And so greatly grieved and sorrowed the Senators, and pitied withal their allies thus unworthily maffacred, so ashamed in themselves they were, that they had not sentaid in time, so deeply offended and incensed with indignation against the Carthaginians, yea, and so mightily seared the losse of the very main chance at home, as if the enemy had been already at the gates of the City: that in very deed, having their minds possessed at one time, with so many troubles, they rather

A trembled and quaked for fear, than fetled themselves to consultation and counsel. For they confidered and faw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountred with them: nor the State of Rome was at any time to refly, to feeble, and to undisposed to war. Moreover, it was commonly faid, that the * Sardi, * Corfi, * Hiftri, and * Illyrici had rather tha lenged . The lienders the Romans, and made bravados of war, than exercised and toiled them in any hard conflicts: of Sandegna. as for the Gauls, they were but tumults, rumors, and alarms which they made, and no wars inot cofice. deed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten fouldiers, inused and hardned This people of for this 23 years in most difficult service of war, amongst the Spanish Nations, and went away e- 1811a. ver with victory: first trained and practifed under Amilea, then under Aldrubal, and now lattly 'The people of B under the conduct of Annibal, a right hardy and valiant Captain. Confidering moreover, that Sulvoma.

now he cometh fresh from the ruin of Saguntam, a most rich City, and passeth straight-wayes over Iberus: drawing after him a train of io many nations of the Spaniards, exercised already by him in the wars: and will no doubt raise the Gauls, a people at all times ready to take arms: so as now they were to wage war in Italy, with no more but all the World befides, yea, and under the walls of Rome, for the defence of the City.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Confuls: but then were they commanded by casting lots, to part them between them. To Corneling fell Spain: To Sempronius Affrick and Sicily. Likewise decreed it was, that for that year, there should be levied ix Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great a navy as might C be, should be rigged and set out. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman sootmen, and of horsemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horie, 220 gallies, with five course of oars on a side, and twenty foills, were fet aflote. After this, a bill was preferred unrothe people, that it might please them to determine and grant, that war should be proclaimed against the people of (arthage. And in regard of that war, there was also a solemn supplication holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to prosper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwist the Con'uls thus were the for es divided: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, confifting of four thousand foot, and three hundred horie a piece; also of allies fixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred

Horse, besides 150 gallies, and twelve barks or foists. With this power for Land and Sea service, D was Sempronius lent into Sicily, from thence to passe over into Affrick, in case the other Conful were able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy, Cornelius had the charge of a finaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretor, was fent in Person into France with a sufficient army: but in the number of ships especially, was Cornelius scanted 60 gallies of five banks of ours be had, and no more, (for it was supposed that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of Horsemen, and 14000 sootmen of allies, with 1200 men of arms. That Province of France (in those parts where the Car- i. 400 to a kethagian was was expected) had that year two Legions of Roman footmen, 14000 allies, belides eith, 1000 Horse from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before war began, it might appear they dealt by order of law, and with juffice; and that

E all due complements might be performed, they lent certain grave and ancient personages in Embaffie into Affrick, to wie, Q. Labius, M. Livius, L. Emplius, C. Licinius, and Q. Bebius, First, to demand and know of the Carthaginians, Whether Annibal by their publick warrant and authority, besieged and assailed Sagunium? then, is they avowed the act, and stood to it (as they were like to do) confessing that it was done by the counsel of the State; to give defiance, and proclaim open war against them. The Romans being arrived at Chrhage, had audience given in their Senat-house: where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, then a principal genator among the Carthaginians stood up and

"Your former Embaffage, my mafters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and The Oration F" would needs have Annibal to be yeelded unto you; as if he had befieged Saguntum of his own of a Senator in "head. And therefore fince it pleafeth you that we should dispute and "diffinguish, between the action of a General, warranted by the publick State, and an enterprise s' proceeding from his own motive; ye shall understand that there was indeed a league between "you and us, contracted by Lattarius the Conful, wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies " of both parties: as concerning the Saguntins (who as then were none of your confederats) there was not one word at all thereins, but in that league. (ye will fay) that was contracted with Af-drubal, the Saguntins are expression anneal and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but even that which I have learned of you. For ye your felves denied, that ye were bound to fland

Whereupon, there was another league anew "drawn out, and by publick agreement enacted. Then Q. Fabrus the Roman Embaffador, having made a hollow lap within the plait and fold of his fide gown, Here quoth he, within this lappet, we present and offer war and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, they all cryed out at once with as great stomack and boldness: Mary even which you will your ielf, I Whereat he let his robe loofe again; Why then, there is war, quoth he, take it amongst you; Let come say they all again, and welcome be it; and as willingly as we accept thereof, so shall we sollow and manage it as throughly.

This direct demand, and round denouncing of war, feemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much dispute and argument about the right of the caute, and of the covenants; a vain matter before, but now especially, after the winning and defirmation of Saguntum, For if the question were to be decided by words and reasoning, that league of Afdrubal which was exchanged for the former of Luctuities, was not the fame nor the tenor thereof to be compared : feeing that in the accord of Luctarius, this branch and proviso was expressely added, That it should stand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof:] but in this of Afdrubal, K there was no such condition at all: and besides, the covenant for so many years space during his life, was so established and confirmed, and no word to the contrary; that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yet, put case they should have flood upon the former alliance; the Saguntins were therein well enough compriled and provided for, in that the allies of either part were excepted and comprehended. For neither was this chuse added [They who at that time were allies] nor yet were they excepted againft, who afterwards should become, or be admitted allies. And seeing that it was lawful to entertain new confederats, who is it that would judge it reasonable, either that no man should be received unto amity for any good defert whatfoever; or being once received into protection, should not be defended accordingly: Provided alwayes, that no allies of the Carthaginians should either be solli-L cited to rebellion, or received again, if of themselves they once revolted.

The Roman Embassadors, as they were commanded at Rome passed the seas from Carthage into Spain, for to vifit all the Cities, and to fee whether they could either draw them to their fociety, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And first they came to the Bargusians, where being courteously emertained (for weary they were of the Carthaginians government) they stirred up many other nations beyond Iberus, to have a defire to change for a new world. From thence they States from banding with the Romans: for thus in a folemn affembly a fage and ancient father among them framed his answer. "With what face can ye (Romans) require us to prefer your friend-

Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volicians immediately, and in no Diet or Councel of Spain, had they afterwards any better entertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vain gone through all Spain, they took their way into Gaul: where they saw a strange light, and a fearful sashion: for all in amour (such was the guife and manner of the country) they came to their publick affemblies : and there, these Embassadors after they had set out in goodly words the greatness and glory of the people of Rome, N and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and therenpon made request, that they would not give the Carthaginians leave (who minded to make war upon Italy) for to pass through their Cities and Towns : hereat they fet up fuch a laughter, with a certain grumbling and murmuring, that scarcely could the youth be stilled and quieted by the Magistrats and Elders ; so sottifh, to foolish, and shameleis seemed this demand, in their conceir that they should once imagine that the Gauls were such fastes, as they would be content (rather than to let the war passe into Italy) to avert and turn it from themselves, and to suffer, yea, and offer their own territories to be spoiled and foraged, for the safety (for sooth) of other mens Lands, who were but meer aliens and strangers unto them. The noise and garboit being at length busht and appealed, this apfwer was returned to the Embassadors: "That neither the Romans had deserved so well nor the O " Carthaginians fo ill at their hands, that they should take arms either for Romans, or against "Carthaginians. But contrary-wise, they were advertised, that some of their nation, wereby "the people of Rome driven out of the marches and confines of Italy put to pay tribute, yea, and

" indured other outrages and indignities. The like demands and aniwers passed to and fro in other Conncels and Assemblies of Gaul: neither could they meet with any friendly enterteinment, or have peaceable words given them, before they came * Maffilia: where, after diligent inquiry, and faithfur fearch made by their allies, they had true advertisements, that Annibal

asorehand had wrought the hearts of the Gauls to his own purpose, and was possessed of them: but they understood withal, that they were not like to continue long in good terms of kindness and favor even to him, (to fierce and favage, to untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unless their Princes and Rulers be ever and anon well fed and plied with gold, whereof that nation of all other is most greedy and covetous. The Roman Embassadors, having thus gone their circuit over all the States of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome; not long after that the Coff, had taken their journey into their Provinces: where they found the whole City possessed with the expectation of war: fo rife and currant was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already passed over the River Iberus.

Annibal after the winning of Saguntum, had retired himself to winter in new Carthage: and there having intelligence what had been done and decreed as well at Rome, as at Carthage | in Africk I and that he was reputed not only the Captain General and Conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this war; so soon as he had divided and sold the rest of the booty and pillage that remained, thought good now to make no longer delayes, but affembled the fouldiers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner, "My trusty friends and loyal consede- The speech of erats, I am periwaded that ye your felves do fee as well as I, now that all the States of Spain are in Annibal to his epeace and quietness, that either yeare to make an end of fouldiery, and all our forces to be caffed Spanith foul-"and discharged from service; or else that ye must remove the war into other Lands. For so dies. "fhall these Nations prosper and slourish, and not only enjoy the blessings of peace, but also reap C" the fruits of war, if we will feek to gain riches, and to acquire glory and honor from others.

"Since therefore we are to war shortly far from home, and doubt it is when you shall see again "your houses, and whatsoever there is deer unto you; if any of you be decrous to visit home, his "wife and children, kinsfolk, and friends, I give him licence and free paiport. But I command " you withal, to shew your selves here again before me in the beginning of the next spring; that "with the help of God, we may in hand with that war, whereby we shall pur hase both worthin "and wealth. There was not one in a manner but well accepted of this liberty to frankly offered by himfelf, and were delirous to have a fight of house and land both for that every one already longed for their friends and kindred, and forelaw in farther time to come, a greater mils, and cause of more longing after them. This rest all Winter time, between their travelspast, and those they D were soon after to endure, refreshed as well their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new pains what loever. So in the very prime of the ipring, according to the Edict aforesaid, they all assembled together again. Annibal having taken a muster and survey of the aids that were lent unto him from all thole Nations, went to * Gades; and there, to Hercules * cadie, or Cahe paid his old vows, and bound himself to new, if the rest of his enterprizes should speed well les Males, or and have good fuccels. After this, dividing and casting care indifferently, as well for offensive as Cales. defensive war, doubting left whiles he went by Land through Spain and France into Italy, Africk should lie open and naked to the Romans from Siely side; purposed to for life and make that part fure with firong garrisons. In lieu whereof, he sent for fresh supply out of Africk, specially of Archers and Javelotiers, and those lightly armed: to the end, that the Africans might serve in

E Spain, and the Spaniards in Africk; like (both the one and the other) to prove the better fouldiers, far from their own countries, and being bound as it were, with mutual and reciprocal pledges. So he sent into Africk 13850 footmen, armed with light targets, and 870 slingers of the Illands * Baleares, 1200 Horsemen also out of fundry Nations, Which forces he disposed, partly *Two Illands for the defence of Carthage, and partly to be divided through Africk, for the guard thereof. He Majorica and fent withal, certain Commissioners into all their Cities to take up fouldiers, and enrolled 4000 of Minerica. Of their chosen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garrison, and to serve for some columba hostages. And supposing that Spain was not to be neglected, and the rather, because he was not and Nura. ignorant how the Roman Embassadors had visited the same round to see how they could sollicit and work the Princes and rulers to their mind, he committed the charge of that Province to his p brother Afdrubal, a valiant and hardy man; and furnished him with good forces, especially out of Africk, to wit, 11850 Africans footmen, 300 Ligurians, 500 Balear Islanders. To this power of footmen, three hundred Horse of the * Libyphornicians, a Nation mixt of Carthaginians and * Within the

Africans. Of * Numidians and Mores, that coast upon the Ocean, 1900. with a small cornet of Kingdom of 200 Horsemen of Ilergetes out of Spain. And because he should want no manner of Land help, Tiange. fourteen Elephants besides. Moreover, there was a fleet allowed him for the desence of the Sea-Inhabitants confts. For by what forces and service the Romans had before got victory, thereby it was likely, Bild-it gerid. that they would fill maintain and continue their wars, $ Gallies therefore of five banks of oars, he had at Sea, two of four, and five of three. But of the five oared gallies aforefaid, he had no more but two and thirty, fitted and well appointed with rowers and marriners, and so were the G five of three banks. From Gades, the army of Annabil returned to winter in Carthage: and from thence he paffed by the City * Ecosifis, and marched forward with his forces to there and the Sea-coalts. * Hitmator Met Where it is reported, that in his sleep he dreamed, and saw a vision namely a young man of divine quintile.

but followed him stills afterwards (as men by nature are curious) when he cast and discoursed in his mind, what it might be, that he was forbidden fo to see behind him, he could not hold and the rule his eyes, but mult needs look back: and then he beheld behind him, a terpent of huge greatnels coming amain, and all the way as it went, to bear down trees, groves, and thickets: and after allthat, he perceived a great storm and tempest ensuing, with mighty thunder-claps. Now when he was debrous to know what this so great consumon and strange fight might fightly, he heard a voyce, faying, That it betokened the ruins and wasting of Italy: willing him therefore, to go still forward with his voyage, and fearch no further into the fecrets of the Gods, but leave them to the hidden destinies. Annibal right joyous at this vision, passed over Iberus with his whole power, divided into three parts having fent terrain before him with gifts and rewards into all parts whereas he should march with his army, to gain the hearts of the Gauls; and withal, to I feek out and discover the passages of the Alpes, So he crossed the River Iberus with 90000 foot. and 12000 Horse, strong. to Hanno, that he might have at his command the freights which joyned France and Spain together. Unto whom heallowed 10000 footmen, and 1000 horse, for to defend and keep in obedience those countries. After that his army was on foot and began to march through the forrest Prenaus, and that there ran amongst the barbarous people a more certain bruit, That they were to make war with the Romans; three thousand footmen of the Carpenats, returned back; and for certain it was known, that they departed not, for fear to much of the war, as the tedious journev and unpassable wayes of the Alpes. Annibal, considering that either to recal them or to keep K them by violence, was a dangerous matter; for fear left thereby he should provoke the fierce flomacks of the rest; sent home again above 7000 of such, as he perceived to be weary, and to have no mind to the service; and made semblance withal, that the Carpetans were by his leave difcharged. And doubting left long flay and ease there, might tempt his foundiers, and give occasion of mutinies, with the rest of his forces he passed Pyreneus, and pitched his camp before the Town * Illuberis. The Gauls, albeit they were advertised, that it was traly, at which Annibal shot; yet because the bruit was blazed, That the Spaniards beyond Iberus, wereby force subdued, and firong garrisons placed in their Cities: certain Nations of them, for fear of servitude and bondage, role up in arms, and affembled together at * Rufcino. Which being related to Annibal, he fearing more that they would flay him in his journey, than endanger him in fight; fent certain L Orators or Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to fignify unto them, "That himself "in person would gladly parle with them, and that it should be in their choice whether they "would come neerer to Illiberis, or himself go forward to Ruscino: where, being neer together, they might more easily meet and conter. For as he was willing to receive them into his camp,

"and would be glad to fee them there: so he would not think much of his pains, to repair unto riers between. But so soon as the Lords of France, who presently removed their camp to Il-and presents, they gave his army good leave to pass through their confines along the Town liberis, were come willingly enough to Annibal, as being bribed and corrupted with money M

"them himself, as one that was thichercome, as a friend and guest unto France, and not as an "enemy; and would not by his good will draw a fword (if the Gauls would let him alone) "before he were entred within Italy. And thus much verily passed by messengers and cour-

Rufaino.

In It aly this while, the Embassadors of Marfeilles had brought no other word to Rome, but that Annibal was only gone over Iberus: but, by that time, the Boil had Hirred up the Infubrians to

mutiny, and were revolted themselves, even as if he had passed the Alpes already: which they did not so much upon old rancour and malice to the people of Rome, as for that, they took it ill and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls country, to be planted about * Padus, * Placen ia and Cremona. Whereupon they arose suddenly, took arms, and entred by force into those parts, and made so foul work and fearful havock, that not only the country people and villagers, but also the three Roman Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Caias N Luttatius, Aul. Servilius, and Titus Annius, who were come to fet out the Lands and territory to the faid Colonies, not truffing the walls of Placentia, fled to * Mutina. That Luctatius was, one of them, it is not doubted: but some records have Q. Acilius and C. Herennius, instead of A. Servilius and T. Annins: and others again, nominate P. Cornelius Afina, and C. Papirius Mafo. It is uncertain also, whether they were the Embassadors sent to the * Bais, to reason or expossulat the matter, that had abuse offred them, and were evil intreated; or that the Triumvirs above faid, were fet upon and affailed as they were measuring out the Lands But whiles they were thus befieged at Mutina, and those Boians lying at fiege (a nation unskilful altogether in the feat of affaulting Towns, and likewise of all other most cowardly, to attempt any martial exploits) whiles they lay idly about the wals, and never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of O a treaty for peace. Whereupon the Roman Embassadors or Commissioners, being by the chief of the Gauls called out to parle, were not only against law of nations, but with bleach also of their faithful promife, and word which they had given that time, apprehended: and the Gauls faid plainly they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These news touching the Embassadors being reported and Mutina with the garison in danger: L. Manlius the Pretor, in great anger and indignation, brought his army in more hast than good order, before Mutina, There were in those dayes great woods about the high way, and most part of the country

A wilds and wasts, not inhabited: where he having engaged himself without his espials, was intrapped within an ambush slott many of his men, and hardly recovered the open champain country. There he incamped himself strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to win the camp, his fouldiers courages were refreshed; albeit it was well known that they had received a threwdfoil, and knew their forces to be much impaired. Then began he to march on, in his journey afresh. And so long as he led his power through the open country, the enemies were not in light : but when they were entred the forrells again, they fet upon the rereward of them: where, besides the great fright and damage of all the rest, 800 Roman souldiers were left dead in the place, and the enemies went away with fix enfigns. But afterwards, the Gauls ceafed to moleft B and trouble, and the Romans gave over to fear, fo foon as they were passed, and escaped the rough, cumbrous, and unpatlable forrests. And the Romans being now able in the open and champian country to march with fafety, made hast to get to * Tannetus a village neer unto the Po. * Tantao. There within a fort which they made for the time, with the help and provision of victuals by the river, and the aid also of certain Gauls called * Brixians, they detended themselves against the enemies, whose number daily encreated. After this sudden tumnit was reported at Rome, and that the LL, of the Senat were advertised, that besides the war with the Carthaginians, the Gauls were up in arms: they gave order, that C. Airilius the Pretor should go (with one Roman Legion, and four thousand aslies, who were enrolled by the Comus in a new levy) to aid Manlius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for fear) came to Tanetus. Also P. C Cornelius having newly levied one Legion in lieu of that which was fent with the Pretor, departed from the City of Rome, and passing with 60 Gaussalong the coasts of Tuscany, Liguria, and so forward of the Salves, shorely arrived at Massilia, and encamped near the next mouth of * Rho- * Rhofae. darus (for the river is divided into many branches, and so dischargeth it self into the Sea) being not fully of belief that Anmbal as yet had passed over the mountains Pyrenas. But when he underflood that he was ready even then to pais Rhodanus also; and doubting in what place to encounter and meet inm, his people as yet not well recovered, after their being fea-fick: he fent before, 300 elect men of arms, guided by the Massilians, and certain Gauls that came to aid; for to discover all, and to take a full view of the enemies fafely without danger.

Annibal having appealed the rett of the country, either for fear or by means of mony, was now D come into the country of the * Volcans, a puillant people and a valiant. These inhabit along * Avignon. both the banks of Rhoda : w : and misstufting that they were notable to defend their Lands against the Carthaginians, on that fide of the River which lay to them: because they might have the whole River to serve them for a good defence and rampier, transported over the Rhofm all in manner that ever they had, and kept the bank on the other fide. The rest of the inhabitants neer to the River, and even those also in whose territories Annibal had set foot already, both he himfelf with gifts allured to gettogether from all parts shipping, and to frame new vessels: and they of themselves likewise, were as willing to have his army transported, and their own country eased and delivered (they cared not how foon) of so great a multitude of troublesome guests. Whereupon, there was got together an huge number of lighters, barges, and boats especially, which

E were made in half without great workmanship; in which the people inhabiting thereby nied to transport wares and commodities from one to another. Other new whirries also, the Gauls began first to make of the hollowed trunks of trees: and after them, the fouldiers for that they had both flore of timber and faw the workmanship but sleight and easy, made in hast certain bottoms, such as they were, like troughs without form or fashion, regarding no handlomeness at all, so they would but flote on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over themselves and that which they had

Now when they had prepared and made all ready for their passage, the enemies on the other fide right against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and Horse, purring them to much trouble and fear. Annibal therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanno Fithe fon of Bomilear, at the first watch of the night, to go up the stream along the river side, one dayes journey, with part of the forces, and thole most of them Spaniards: and wheresoever he first could espie a convenient place, to cross the river, and to land as secretly as he could: and then to fetch about with his men, that when need were he might charge upon the back of the enemy. Hereunto were appointed certain Gauls for guides: who from thence conducted them some 25 miles above to a little I and compassed about with the river, which here spred out in bredth by reason that it divided it self, and thereby the channel was not so deep: wherethey shewed him a place of passage. There, in all hast they cut down and hewed timber, and made boats, to set over Horse and man and other burthen. The Spaniards made no more ado, but fast ning their appared to vessels of lether like bladders, sull of wind, and laying their bucklers thereup n, sat alost and G paffed over nimbly. The rest of the army also, with joyning planks and troughs together, was fet over. Where having encamped neer the river, as being weary with their night journey, and toillome work, they rested one day to re resh themselves, whiles their Captain studied and was occupied, to execute his commission and his intended service in good and onvenient time. The morrow, after, they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by smoke that they were passed over and not far off. Which when Annibal perceived, for that he would not lose the vantage of that time, he gave fignal to his men alfo to get over the water. Now had the footmen already their boats prepared and fitted. And the course and ranks of barges (which to receive and break the force of the current from above, transported the Horiemen, besides the Horses that swam it after) made for the imall boats that passed beneath, a gentle and calm water. For a number of Horles Iwam after the ships, haled by the bridle reins which were tied to the poups, besides those, which being sadled and bridled, and fitted to serve the men of arms to soon as ever they were landed, were bestowed in barges and serry boats. The Gauls stood upon the bank with loud hooping, hollowing, yelling and finging after their manner, who haking their targets over their heads, brandishing and florishing their swords in their right hands, shewed themselves ready to receive them, albeit fo great a number and World of barges and boats full in their eye over against them, together with an hideous roaring of the water, might have scared them: besides sundry noises of mariners and souldiers, who laboured and strived to break the power and force of the I water, and who being on the other fide of the bank encouraged their fellows that were paffing over. And thus frighted enough as they were, with the tumult and noise presented before their faces: behold there arose a more searful and terrible outcry behind their backs, upon the forcing and winning of their camp by Hanne. And himself in person came soon after: so that they were our infear on both fides. For not only out of the thips there was a great multitude got to Land. but also a power at their backs unlooked for, came forward and charged them. The Gauls, after they had made some refistance, and saw they were easily put back; brake through, where they espied the way to lie most open, and so in great sear they fled divers wayes into their Towns and Villages. Annibal then, having conveied over the rest of his forces by leifure, cared no more now for any French ftirs and tumults, and to encamped himfelf. But for the transporting of the K Elephants, I suppose there were fundry devices: and certainly, however it was, the thing is diverfly recorded. Some fay, that when the Elephants were gathered together upon the bank, the most couragious and fiercest of them all, was chafed, angred, and railed of purpose by his maffer or keeper: and when he was purioed of the beatt, and to fave himself fled from him, and xook the River, thereupon the Elephant followed after him as he fwam, and so drew after him the whole drove of the reft: and as any one of them (fearing the depth) failed to wade, the very force of the River carried him to the other fide. But it is more credibly and certainly reported. that they were conveyed over incertain barges: which as it was a faler way and furer course before it was practited, so when it was done and past, it was more easily credited. They caused therefore one vessel or barge, 200 foot long, and 50 foot broad, to reach from the strand side and L the shore into the River; which because it should not be carried down with the course and fiream of the water, they fastned to the bank above with many strong ropes, and like as it had been a bridge, they covered it over with earth, that the beafts might boldly go thereon as upon the firm ground. Now there was another barge full as broad, but of length only 100 foot; firted and appointed to pass the River, and was tied and coupled thereto: and when as the Elephants (driven after the females going before) upon the fleady barge, as it had been upon a causey, were sone over into the leffer which was fall ned unto it; then prejently was it looled from the bonds wherewith it was flightly tyed, and so haled and drawn by certain galley boats, directed withours through to the other bank. Thus when the first were landed, they went for more still, until they were all fet over: and verily, folong as they were driven on fill, as it were upon a long bridge, M they nothing feared: the formost only were assaid when the barge was loosened, and they parted from their fellows, and to were caried away into the wide and deep River, where thronging and fitugling together, and juffling one another, they made some trouble, whiles they that were outmost gave back from the water asmuch as they could until such time as very fear (when they faw all about them nothing but water) caused them to be quiet. Some of them also like raging beafts as they were, and unruly, fell out into the River, but by reason of their heaviness, they flood fure, and casting their Governors, they fought the founds foot by foot, by little and little, and got fafe to Land.

The one and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Whiles the Elephants were thus transporting over, Annibal in the mean time had sent 500 Numidian light Horsemen to the Romans camp, as espials to discover the ground, where they N were to learn what forces they had, and liften after their defigns and purposes. This wing and troop was encountred by three hundred Roman Horsemen, sent as is aforesaid from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruel skirmish than for so small a number, for besides many hurt, there were flain on both fides in a manner alike: but in the end, the fear and flight of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans, being now already much travailed and wearied: on whose part (being the winners) were slain 160. not all Romans, but some Gauls: and on the losers fide who were overcome, there dyed above 200. This beginning and prognofication as it were of the war, as it portended and prefaged an happy end and fuccess of the whole unto the Romans: fo it shewed plainly, that the victory would hang long in equal balance, not without much effusion of bloud, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each O one to his own Captain. As for Scipio, he could not refolve to take any course himself; but according as he saw the plots and enterprizes of the enemy, so to frame his own. And Annibal 2gain being uncertain whether to go forward with his journy begun, into Italy, or to give battel unto the first army of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all present conflict, by occasion of the coming of the Embassadors of the Bois and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Matalus; who promiting to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and companions in his perils, thought it good, and gave advice to invade and fet upon Italy first of all before

A any other war, whiles forces were entire in heart, no where put to the hazard, and to give them as it were the first hansel. The common multitude of the Carthaginians (for that the former war was not clean forgot and out of remembrance) feared verily their enemies, but more their infinit journey, and the Alprespecially, the name whereof to men not experienced, was very searful & rerrible. Whereupon, Annibal being now resolute to march onward in his journey, and to pass into Ital: aftembled his people to an audience, and by fundry means, as well by way of rebuke, as also by encouragement, windeth and affayeth the minds of his fouldiers. When in these terms he had exhorted and encouraged his souldiers, he commanded them to E take their repail and repose, to cherish and refresh their bodies, and to prepare themselves for the march. The morrow after he departed crois from the banks of Khodanus, and entired the inland parts of France: not for that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but because he thought the further he went from the Sea fide, in to much leffe danger he should be of meeting the Rumans, with whomhe was not minded to fight, before he was arrived into Iraly, After that he had mans, with whome was not an illand, where the two rivers * Arm and Rhodanus iffur * The River ing out of fundry parts of the Alps, and taking a direct course, after they have run through a good same. part of the country fall at length together and meet in one and the ground lying between is called by the name of the lland. new foords, and casteth up new shelves and whirl-pits, (for which cause also a footman hat ha much ado to wade therethrough, and knoweth not the foords) besides, it tolleth down round stones and pibbles, whereby there is no sure nor safe footing for him that would wade through And it chanced at that time, that it swelled and was risen high by fall of rain, and by land-floods. and canfed them to have very much to do, that paffed over it: and over and befides all other difficulties, they were of themselves troubled and disquieted through their own fearfulness and sundry cries which they made. Publius Cornelius the Conful, about three dayes after that Annibal diflodged from the bank of Rhodanus, was arrived with his army (arranged in a fourfquare battel) as far as the place where the enemy was lately encamped, purpoking without any flay to give him battel. But seeing the hold abandoned, and that he was not like to overtake him, being to I far gone forwards; he returned to his ships at Sea, supposing by that means, with leffe danger and difficulty, to encounter Annibal as he descended from the Alps, But left that Spain (which was the Province allotted unto him) should be left disfurnished of Roman succours , he sent his brother Cn. Scipio with the greatest part of his forces against Asdrubal: not so much to defend their old allies, and procure new, as to drive Afdrubal out of Spain. Himself with a very fmall company returned to *Genua, with intent to guard Italy, with that army which was about

Annibal being departed from Druentia, marched for the most part through the champion countries, and came in peace and quietly, to the foot of the Alps, for any trouble from the peafants that there inhabited. And albeit he had some knowledge of the Alps before by report, if (which useth to make things that are uncertain, much more than indeed and truth they are) yet feeing now neer at hand the height of those Hills, and the snows, entermingled along with the skie; the rude and mishapen houses set upon rocks; the cattel, sheep, oxen, and horses, singed with cold; the people with long shagg'd hair, and without any trimming, both living and liveless creatures, even parched, stiff and stark with frost; and all things else more strange and ilfavoured, than can be spoken: then began his souldiers to sear afresh. So soon as they advanced forward, and began to march up the first cliffs, there appeared over their heads the mountain people, who had seized the Hills: who if they had kept the secret and hidden vallies, and suddenly all at once chatged upon them they would have made a foul flaughter of them; and put them to flight. Then Annibal commandeth the enfigns to stand still, and sent certain Gauls afore, as espials; by whom I. he understood, that there was no passage that way: whereupon, he pitched his camp amonest those craggy and seep rough places, upon as large a plain and valley as he could find. Then by the same Gauls (who much differed not in tongue and manners from the other; and had entermingled themselves in talk with the mountainers) heunderstood, that they kept the passage, but in the day time, and flipt away in the night, every one to his own harbour. So at the break of day he mounted those steep hills, as if he would openly in the day time march through the streights. Thus having spent the day in making semblance and shew of one thing, and intending another, he encamped himself strongly in the place where he had rested and staid: and so soon as he perceived, that the mountain people were departed from the fleep hills, and kept not so fireight watch and ward; after that he had made shew of fires, more than for the number of those that re- w mained behind; and left with the Cavalry all the bag and baggage, with the greatest part of the footmen: himself in person took unto him the nimblest, most active, and valiant souldiers lightly appointed, and with all speed passed through the streights aforesaid, and encamped on the very hills which the enemies before held and befet. Then in the morning betime his camp dislodged and the army behind, began to march and fet forward. By which time the mountainers, at the ordinary fignal given, came forth out of their Castles and Forts, and met at the usual plate of their accustomed guards: but then all at once they might see some of the enemies over their heads, to have gained their own fortress, and others also marching in the way. Both which objects at one time presented to their eye, made them blank and to stand still in a muse a good while. But afterwards, when they faw Annibal his army, diftreffed in the fireights, and in great trouble N. and disorder among themselves in the march, by reason especially the horses were so affrighted? supposing, that the least fear and terror (besides) that they could procure, would be enough for their enemies overthrow and confusion, they croffed the rocks overthwart, and (as they were accustomed and used to them) ranto and fro, up and down through the blind and unhaunted bywayes. But then verily, the Carthaginians were much encumbred; as wellby their enemies, as also by the disadvantage of the place, and more ado there was among them (whiles every one strove who should first escape the danger) than with the enemy. There was nothing that disordered and troubled the army, in the march, so much as their own hories, which (by reason of the distonant and divers cryes, that the ecchoes between the woods and vallies redoubled) were affrighted; and also if any of them chanced to be fricken, galled, or wounded; they kept fuch winting, and flinging a- O bout them that they overthrew and made great havock of men, and of all forts of carriage. Befides, the press was so great, and the streights of both sides so steep and craggy, that many a man was thrown down head-long a mighty heights yea, and some of them armed: and the sumpter horses and beasts for carriage especially tumbled down amain with their load as it a house or Cafile had come down with a michief. Which, although it were terrible to behold, yet Annibal for a while flood fill, and kept his own men togethers for fear of encreasing this disorder and affright. But after that he faw his army disbanded and marching in difarray, and that it was to no pur-

A pose to lead his army safe through the streights, if he lost the carriages: for sear hereof, he ran down from the higher ground, and albeit, with the violence of his charge, he discomfited the enemy, yet he encreased the trouble and fear of his own people. But that was soon appealed in a very moment, after the wayes and passages were once cleared, by reason of the Mountainers that were fled : fo that within a while the whole hoft passed through, not only are ale and leifure, but also in a manner without any noise at all. This done, he seized upon a Castle, which was the chief strength of that country, with other villages lying about it: and for three dayes space he victualled and maintained his whole army, with the Cattel of his prisoners. And for that he was now neither molefted with the Mountainers, who were at the hift discomfitted, nor B greatly encumbred with the difficulties of the wayes, in those three dayes he rid a good deal of ground, and journeied a great way into the country; until at the length he came to another coast well peopled (for such Mountain and Hilly quarters;) where he had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in his own professed cunning: first, by a subrise practice, and after by a secret ambush. Certain ancient men, the Rulers and Governours of the Castles, repaired unto Annibal as Orators, faying, That they having been taught and made wife, by the profitable example of other mens harms, made choice, rather to trye the amity, than prove the force of the Carthaginians; and therefore were willing to do his commandment, and be at his devotion: requesting him to take at their hands victuals and guides for their journey, yea, and hostages also for better assurance of promises to be performed. Annibal neither overhassily be-C lieving them, nor yet churlifhiy distrusting and refusing their offer, lest being rejected and cast off, they might become open and professed enemies; gave them good language, and a courteous answer, received the hostages whom they gave, accepted victuals, which they had brought with them to maintain his army by the way, and followed their guides, but so, as his army was not dilarraied in their march, as if he had been amongst his friends, and in a peaceable countrey. First, went in the van-guard the Elephants, and the Horiemen; himself marched after with the flower and strength of his Footmen , looking all about him with an heedful eye, So foon as he was entred a narrow passage, which of the one side lay under a steep Hill that commanded them aloft, the barbarous people role out of their ambush from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far off and neer at hand; yea, and rol-D led down mighty huge flones upon them as they marched. But the greatest number came behind upon their backs: against whom he curned and made head with the power of his footmen, and without all peradventure (if the tail both of his army, had not been frong and well fortified) they must needs have received in that lane and streights, an exceeding great overthrow. And even then, as it was, they came to an extremity of danger, and in manner fell into a present mischief. For whiles Annibal made long stay, and doubted whether he should engage the Regiment of footmen within the freights, for that he had not left any fuccours in the reregard to back the footmen, like as himfelf was a defence to the Horiemen; the mountainers came overthware, and flanked them; and breaking through the files of the battel, befet the way, and croffed upon him. So that Annibal took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages and Hosfe-E men. The morrow after, when as the bagh irous people ran between them more coldly than before, he joyned his forces together, and passed the streight not without great damm see and loss; but with more hurt of the sumpter Horles than of men. After this, the Mountainers (fewer in number, and in robbing wife rather than in warlike fore) ran in heaps, one while upon the vanguard, other while upon the rereward, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by staying another while behind win and catch any occasion and opportunity. The Elephants as they were driven with great leiture, because the ough these narrow streights, they were ready ever and anon to run on their noies: so what way soever they went, they kept the army fafe and jurefrom the enemies; who being not used unto them, durit not once come neer. The ninth day he won the very tops of the Alps, through by-lanes F and blind cranks: after he had wandred many times out of the way, either through the deceifulnels of their guids; or for that when they durft not trust them, they adventured rashly themfelves upon the vallies, and gueffed the way at adventure and went by aim. Two dayes abode he encamped upon the tops thereof, and the fouldiers wearied with travel and fight rested that time: certain also of the sumpter Horses (which had slipt aside from the rocks) by following the tracks of the army as it marched, came to the camp. When they were thus overtoiled and wearied with these tedious travels, the snow that fell (for now the star Vergily, was set and gone down out of that horizon) increased their sear exceedingly. Now when as at the break of day the enfigns were fet forward, and the army marched flowly, through the thick and deep frow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, flothfulness and desperation: Annibal ad-G vanced before the standards, and commanded his fouldiers to stay upon a certain high Hill, (from whence they had a goodly prospect and might see a great way all about them) and there shewed unto them feats, and the goodly champian fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpine Mountains: faying. That even then they mounted the wals not only of Italy, but allo of the City of Rome; as for all befides (faith he), will be plain and easy to be travelled: and after one or two battels at the most, ye shall have at your command, the very Castle and head City of all Italy. Then began the army to march forward: and as yet the enemies verily themselves adventured nothing at all, but some petty robberies by stealth, as opportunity and occasion served.

Howbeit they had much more difficult travailing down the hill, than in the climbing and getting h up; for that most of the passages to the Alps from Italy side, as they be shorter, to they are incre poright: for all the way in a manner was fleep, narrow, and flippery, to as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and slumbled never so little, could they possibly (they flaggered fo) recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well Horse as Man. After this they came to a much narrower rock, with crags and rags so steep downright, that hardly a nimble fouldier without his armor and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being before naturally of it leif freep and pendant with a down-fall, now was choked and dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful and montrous I height. There the Horsemen stood still as if they had been come to their wayes end : and when Annibal marveiled much what the matter might be that stayed them so, as they marched not on: word was brought him that the Rock was unacceffible and unpaffable. Whereupon he went himfelf in person to view the place, and then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compais about, yet he had gained nought thereby, but conducted his army, to paffe through wilds, and fuch places as before had never been beaten and troden. And verily that (of all other) was such, as it was impossible to pass through. For, whereas there lay old snow untouched and not trodden on, and over it other show newly fallen, of a small depth; in this soft and tender fnow, and the fame not very deep, their feet as they went, eafily took hold :but that fnow, being once with the going of so many people and beafts upon it, fretted and thawed, they were fain to k go upon the bare ice underneath, and in the flabbery frow-broth, as it relented and melted about their heels. There they had foul ado and much flrugling, for that they could not tread fore upon the flippery ice: and again going as they did (down hill) their feet fooner failed them : and when they had helped themselves once in getting up, either with hands of knees; if they chanced to fall again, when those their props and stayes deceived them, there were no twigs nor roots about. whereon a man might take hold, and reft or flav himfelf, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poor beatts could do, was to tumble and wallow only, upon the flippery and glaffie ice, and the molten flabby fnow. Other whiles also, they perished, as they went in the deep inow, whiles it was yet foft and tender: for when they were once flidden and fallen, with flinging out their heels, and beating with their hoofs more forcibly for to take hold, they brake the ice L through; so as most of them, as if they had been caught fast and settered, stuck still in the deep, hard frozen, and congealed ice. At laft, when as both man and beaft were wearied and overtoiled and all to no purpole, they encamped upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado clented the place aforehand for that purpote: fuch a deal of frow there was to be digged, shovelled, and thrown out. This done, the fouldiers were brought to break that rock, through which was their only way: and against the time that it was to be hewed through; they selled and overthrew many huge trees that grew there about, and made a mighty heap and pile of wood the wind semed fith for the time to kindle a fire, and then they fer all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot, they powred thereon from Vinegar for to calcine and diffolye it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with picke-axes, and made them deicent gentle and early, by means of moderar windings and turnings: so as not only the Horks and other beafts, but even the Elephants also might be able to go down. Four dayes he spent about the levelling of this rock : and the beafts were almost pined and loft for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grass; and look what forage there was, the snow overhilled it. The dales and lower grounds have some little banks lying to the sim, and sivers with al, neer noto the woods, yea, and places more meet and befeening for then to inhabit. There were the labouring beatts put out to grass and passure, and the couldiers that were wearied with making the wayes, had three dayes allowed to reft in. From thence they went down into the plain country, where they found both the place more easy and pleasant, and the natures of the inhabitants

In this manner, and by this means principally, entred the Carthaginians into Italy, five months after they departed from new Caribage / as some write:) and within fifteen dayes overcame and passed the Alps. What power Annibat had, when he was arrived in Italy, the historians do not agree. They that speak with the most, write that he was 100000 foot, and 20000 horse strongs they that make the least of it; fay they were 20000 foot, and 6000 horse, L. Cincius Alimentus, who hath delivered under his hand, that himfelf was taken prifoner by Annibal (a writer of great authority) would induce me sufficiently to believe him, but that he setteth down the number of confusedly, by adding to the rest, the Gauls and Lightians. He recordeth, that counting them, the Infantry was 80000, and the Cavalry 10000, which was conducted into Italy (but likely it is that from all parts there came more thither than fo, and fo fome Authors do report,) and that be o heard from Annibal his own mouth, that after he had passed Rhodanus, he had lost 36000 men, and a great number of Hories and other beafts of burden, when he was come down into the Taurins Country, which was the next Nation in Italy, adjoyning to the Gauls. Which being a thing agreed upon amongst all, I marvel so much the more, that there is any doubt, on which side he went over the Alps: and that commonly it is believed, that he passed by a place called Penninum, and that therenpon the top of the Albitook the name, and was fo called. Colins faith, he took his way over by the top of Cremon: both which passages surely would have

A brought him not into the Taurius country, but through the mountain forselfs, unto the Gauls called Libui. But neither is it probable, that in those days the fame passages were open into France: considering, that the wayes which lead to Pennium were environed with nations half Germans. And certainly the Veragrians, who inhabit this very top (in case a man may build ought upon this conjecture) never knew that these mountains took the name of any passage of the Carthaginians, that way: but of some one place consecrated in the top of the hill, which the peasants and mountainers called Pennium.

Very happily and fitly it fell out for the enterprise of his first designments, that the Taurins the next nation he came unto made war upon the Infubrians. But Annibal being bufied in refresh-Bing his army (that now had most feeling of their harms which they had caught before) could not arm the same to the aid and graphing of either party: for eale after travel, plenty upon icar.ity, good keeping and delicate, after loathsome nashiness, did by a sudden change greatly alter and diftemper their lean and pined bodies, well neer favage and wild grown. Which was the cause that P. Cornelius the Conful, being arrived and landed at Pife, after he had received of Manlius Attilias an army of new and raw fouldiers, fearful for fome shameful disgrace and defeat lately received, made halte and highed him to the Po, for to give battel unto the enemy, before he were well refreshed and in heart again. But by that time that the Conful was come to Placentia. Annihal had dislodged and removed his camp, and won by assault the chief City or Town of the Tauring, because it willingly yeelded not to accept of his amity and protection; and surely not by sear only. but also of voluntary good will, he had gained unto him the Gauls that inhabited about the Po. but that the sudden coming of the Consul interrupted and surprized them, as they were casting about to fpie some opportunity of rebellion. So Annibal dislodged, and removed out of the Taurins country, with this opinion, that the Gauls especially, being doubtful as yet what part to take, would follow him being present in place, Now were the armies in manner one in fight of the other, and the Generals approached nigher together: and as they were not yet well known one unto the other, so they had already both of them a great opinion, and reciprocal admiration one of the other. For as Annibal was much renowned, and his name right well known among the Romans, even fince before Saguntum was loft: fo Scipio was taken of him, and reputed for fome fingular and excellent man, in that he especially above all other, was chosen General against him. Which mutual conceit and impression they had, they augmented themselves one to the other: for that Scipio, albeit he was left behind in France, yet he met Annibal, and was ready to make head against him, so soon as he was passed the Alps: and Annibal again, because having enterprifed fo great an adventure, as to pass the Alps, and now brought the same to good effect. But Scipio to prevent Annibal in crofting the Po before him, removed his camp to the river Ticinus : and for to encourage his fouldiers, before he hrought them forth to battel, he made an Oration unto them, and began in this manner,

"My valiant fouldiers and truly friends, if I were now to lead that army into the field, which "I had with me in France, I would have forborn to make any speech at all unto you ; forto what "purpose needed I to exhort, either that Cavalry, which so valiantly had vanquished the horse-E" men of the enemies at the river Rhodanus: orthole legions, with whom I followed in chase as it "were; even these very enemies, and whose falling off and resufing battel, I take to be a confession "of victory? But now for as much as that army, being indeed levied for the province Spain, " ferveth with my brother Cn. Scipio, under my name and commission, where it pleaseth the Senat and people of Rome, they should be employed, to the end that ye might have a Consul to be "your Captain, against Annibal and the Carthaginians, I have willingly offered my self to this "war. If being then, your new Captain, and you my new fouldiers, meet it is and convenient. "I should use a few words unto you. And to the end you should not be ignorant, either of the "manner of this service, or quality of your enemy; with those menye are to fight, whom in the "former Punick war ye overcame both by land and fea; of whom for these twenty years ye have F" received tribut; from whom ye have won (as the due wages and reward of the war) Sicily "and Sardinia both, and them do hold and occupy. In this battel therefore, both you and they are to carry that mind, and to to be affected, as winners and lolers are to be for never think that "it is valor and hardinels that provoketh them now to fight, but meet necessity and compulsion enforces them to the field. Unless you wil believe that they who when they had an entire army and unfoiled, refused battel, should now have greater hope, and take more contage, after they have lost two parts of their hope and foot, in the very passage of the Alp; and of whom, there. "have more perished in a manner, then remain alive. But well some man say, True it is, few they "are in number, but front in heart, and tall of hand, whole firength & puissance, no force is hardly "able to abide. Images they are nay, to say more truly, the very shadows of mep, and no better: with hunger bitten, with cold flaved loft for want of keeping, fpoiled with natinels, and flithy, or ordere, bruifed and weakhed among that focks and craggy cliffs: over and befides, joints and "marrow died up and burg", their finews fhrunk, hard, and (tiff again with cold and chilling frow, their lims finged with bitter front, their armor cruthed bruifed, and their weapons bro-"ken; their horses, no other then lame jades and poor hide-bound Tits. But peradventureit was so meer, and reason would, that H "the gods themselves without mans help, should against that Captain and nation, which had bro-"ken league and covenants, begin the war first, set it in good forwardness, and bring it to the point " of an end; and then we, who next to the gods have been offended and wronged, should finish "the same thus begun to our hands, and brought to so good a pass. I fear not that any man here "doth think, that I utter these brave and glorious words only for to hearten you, and that my "felf think otherwise in heart, then I speak with tongue. I might have gone my self well enough "into Spain, my proper and peculiar province, (where I had been aforetime) and with an army of mine own: I should have had my brother there, both a counsellor to me in my distresses, and "a companion with me in my dangers. I found Afdrubal rather then Annibal mine enemy, and I " no doubt, the affairs and charge of the war far less then here. But when Lailed by the coast of " France, and upon the bruit and news of this enemy was fet a land, I tent my Cavalry before, and " removed camp as far as to Rhodanus, and in a battel of horsemen for with that part of my forces "it was my hap to encounter and fight) I discomfitted the enemy: and for that by land I could "not overtake his Infantry, so hastily they marched away, like men that fled) I was fain to return "to the fea, and embark again into my ships: and with as great expedition and speed as I could "make (confidering to great a compass about of sea and land) at the very foot of the A/ps, I was "ready to encounter and affront him. Can it be thought then, that whiles I shunned and avoided " fight, I fell by chance and at una wares upon this dread and redoubted enemy? or rather, that "I followed him hard at heels? and challenged him, to draw him forth unto a battel, thereby to K "have it decided who should have the victory in the end? We might wel, if we " had been so minded, when they were enclosed and thut fast within Eryx, have put them to the or namost extremity of all worldly pain, and famished them. We might have passed over with our "victorious Armado into Africk, and within few days forced and razed Carthage, without any " battel fought. We pardoned them at their humble request, and took them to mercy; we let them M out where they were belieged and beleaguered; and notwithstanding that they were by us sub-"dued, we made peace, and contracted amity with them; and afterward, when they were moleer fied and diffressed with the Africans war, we counted them within our protection. In recom-"pence of these good favours and demerits, they come against us, under the leading of an humoerous brain-fick and furious young man, to invade and affail our country. And I would it had "pleased God, that we had all this war for our honor only and reputation, and not for our latery er and our lives. But we are to fight now, not for the holding and possession of Sicily and Sardinia, as in times past; but for our freehold, and the inheritance of leady: and that which more is, "there is no army behind our backs to withstand and make head against the enemy, if we chance to fail of victory; neither are there any more Alps, which while he is getting over we might have N es leignre in the mean time to affemble and prepare new forces. Here in this very place (fouldiers) "must we stand to it, and make resistance, as if we were fighting under Rome walls. Let every man et think that he is not only to defend and ward his own body, but to protect his wife and little chilet dren: and let every one regard and take care, not for his privat affairs and domestical charge, "but often confider this, That even now the Senat and people of Rome beholdeth and feeth our "hardy deeds, and look how our force and valor now speedeth and sheweth it self, such from et henceforth will the state and fortune be of that City and Empire of Rome.

These words had the Consulto the Romans, But Annibal, supposing that his men were first to be encouraged by representation of some deeds, & then exhorted with words; having marshalled his army in a round compais(as it were) to behold some spectacle in a Theatre : he set in the midft of of them all, the prisoners mountainers, bound (as they were hand and foot: and cashing down at their feet, the armor and weapons of the Gauls, he demanded of them by attuchman, or interpreter, Which of them (upon condition to be eased of his bands, and to have armor, and an horse of fervice, given him for a prize of victory) would enter into combat, and fight at the utterance for his life. And when they allanswered with one voice, That they would wish no better, and not one of them but called for a fword & required to fight: and therupon, the lots were shuffled to be call, & not one there was but wished himself to be the man, whom fortune would chuse for the cobat.

A Then every man as his lot fell, in token of cheerfulness and contentment of spirit, leapt for joy among his fellows that rejoiced in his behalf, fell a dancing after their manner, and to (haftily) took arms and weapons: all the while that they were in fight there appeared such affection and disposition of mind, as well in them that were in the same state and condition, as also in those who flood there as spectators only in the multitude to look on; that no less happy and fortunat were they accounted, who ie chance it was to die in the place, then those who had the upper hand. Upon the fight of some couples that were thus matched in combat, he dismissed them and whiles he saw them in this good mind, so well affected and resolute, then he affembled them all together to an audience, and thus by report he spake unto them.

"My valorous fouldiers, if in the confideration of your own fortune, ye will anon but beer "that mind, which even now ye shewed in beholding the example of the state of others; the jour-"ney is ours, and we have the victory. For that was not a dumb shew and bare pageant, but a ve-"ry mirror and pattern of your own condition: and I wot not, whether fottune hath compafied "about with harder bonds and greater necessities, your own selves, or your prisoners. Well may "they be cowards, and play the idle lusks, having a place of retuge to retire unto, who in their 66 own country and ground may be received, when they take their heels and run through waves " without danger, to fave themselves. As for us, it stands us upon to play the men, and to make " account of no mean defigns between victory and death, but upon certain delpair of all shifts be-"fides, either to obtain victory; or if fortune shall fail and give us the foil chuse rather to die figh-"ting, than to be killed flying. If this be lettled and deeply imprinted in your hearts, if this be your "refolution, I will fay once again, The day is yours. A more poinant and sharper goad, than "this, to provoke men to victory never gave the immortal gods to any whatfoever.

When by these Orations, the 10th diers hearts of both sides were inflamed to fight, the Romans made a bridg over 1:01ms; and for defence of the bridg, erected a sconce and fort thereupon. But Annibal while the chemies were buse at work, sent Maharbal with a Cornet of Numidians; to the number of 500, light horiemen, to overrun and waste the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withal to make as great spare of the Gauls as he could, and to tollicit and perswade their Nobles and Lords unto rebellion. After the bridg was finished the Roman army passed over into the Insubrians country, encamped themselves upon certaine I hills, five miles off from a village where Annibal alfo lay in camp: who feeing there was abattel toward, fent speedily for Maharbal back again, and the horsemen: and thinking belike, that he could never fav enough to his fouldiers, and admonish them sufficiently to do well and animate them to fight, he called them all again together to an andience; where he proposed, and promised unto them openly, certain affired rewards, the hope whereof might incite them to fight namely, Imprimis, that he would endow them with fair lands in Italy, Africk, or Spain, where they would themselves to have, and to enjoy to him and to his heirs for ever, as free hold in frank tenure, without service: if any one would chuse to have money rather then land him he would content with filver. Item, of the allies, as many as hereafter were defirous robe enfranchifed Citizens of Carthage, they should have their free burgeosie: & those that had a mind rather to return home again, M he would endeavor and bring about that he should live so well, as not one of them would wish for to exchage his state with any of his neighbors and countrimen whatsoever. Last of all, look what bond servants attended and followed their masters, to them he promised freedom; and that in lieu of them, he would deliver again, unto their mafters, two for one, of the flaves takencaptives in war. And that they might be affured, that he would perform all these promises, he held with his left hand a Lamb, and in the right a flint stone, and prayed solemnly. That if he sailed herein, Jupiter and the rest of the gods, would so kill him, as he slew that Lamb . and presently after his prayer done, he smote the Lamb on the head, and dasht out the brains. Wherear they all every one, conceived and embraced affured hope unto themselves, that the godssaid Amenand were on their fide and supposing that the only stay of enjoying their hopes, and obtaining their N rewards, was, because they had not fought already; with one heart and voice they called for

The Romans for their part, were nothing to lufty; for befides other things, they were affrighted with new prodigies and fearful fights. For it hapned that a Wolf entred their camp, & after he had worried and torn those that came in his way, escaped unhurt. Also a swarm of Bees setled upon a tree that grew over the General's pavilion. Which strange tokens being purged and cleared by an expiatory facrifice, Scipio with his Cavalry and darts lightly appointed, went toward the camp of the enemy to view their forces, and to observe how many and of what condition and quality they were; and there he encountred Annibal, who also was gone forth with his horsemen to discover the country about. At the first they saw not one another, but afterwards, by reason of the thick dust of that rose upon the march of so many men and horses, they knew that enemies approached necr. On both fides the battaillons made a stand, and every man buckled himself to the skirmish. Scipio placed his Archers and horsemen of the Gauls in the forefront: the Romans and strength of Allies, he best owed behind for succours in the reregard. Annibat set in this battel, his great batbed horses with his lances and men of arms, and strengthned the wings with Numidian horsemen. The very first charge and shout was scarce done, when the Archers aforesaid retired among the rereguard in the second battaillon: by occasion wherefithe horsmen alone fought a good while in qualbattel: yea, and afterwards, because the footmen that were intermingled among troubled and difordered the horses, many eitherfell, or else alighted from their horses, to go thither where they faw their fellows to be environed and overcharged. The conflict became very doubtful in many places until such time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, shewed themselves behind the backs of the Romans: this featful fight troubled them greatly, and the fear was encreased by reason of the Consul his hurt; the extream danger whetof, was put by and avoided by the refeue of his fon (then a very stripling as yet, and scarce had any hairupon his face) this youth is he, who had the honor of happy ending this war, furnamed afterwards (upon the noble victory and memorable conqueit over "Annibal and the Cuthagini-Bans) Africanus, But the Archers were they that fled failett away, even tho'e whom the Numidia ans let upon first. The rest that were horsemen, keeping thick and close together, recovered their Conful within their files into the midft of them: and protecting him not only with their weapons, but also with their bodies, brought him back safe unto the camp : retiring all the way reither diforderly nor like fearful men over hattily. The honor of laving the Conful, Calius attributeth unto a bondflave of Liguria. But I verily would rather believe it of the fon: which also the gree's ter number of authors do affirm, but the common tame goeth of the faid bondslave. This was the first battel with Annibal: wherein it easily appeared that the Carthaginians were better in Cavaly, and therefore the open plain field fuch as were between the Po and the Alps, were not fo good for the Romans to fight in. The night following therefore. Scipio commanded his fouldiers fecretly

C without any noise to truss up bag and baggage, and to dislodge: and removed from Ticinus, and made hafte to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unlooted one from the other, in which (as. upon a bridge) he had brought over his army, he might without any trouble and pursuit of the enemy, conduct the same back again. And they came to Placentia before that Annibal knew they were departed from Ticinus; howbeit, he took some of them that made stay on the hither side of the bank, as they were too flow about disjoining and loofening the forefaid bridg of boats : upon which he could not pass over, by reason that when both ends were let loose, the planks and all, went down the water with the fiream. Colius writeth, that Mago with his horses, and Spanish footmen, prefently, swam over the river; and that Annibal himself led over his army at the upper foords of Po: for which purpole, helet the Elephants along on arow to break and bear off the

D violence and stream of the current. A thing jurely that they were hardly able to do, who were skilful and by long experience knew the nature of the River very well. For it foundeth not like a truth that horsemen with their armor and horses safe, could overcome so great a rage of the river, although we should grant that all the Spaniards gat over upon blown bladders or leather vesfels, and befides, they had needed many days to fetch a compais for to find the foords of Po, over which, the army (laden with carriage) might be conveighed. But those authors carry more credit and authority with me, who write that scarcely in two days they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joined together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spanish light horsemen were fent that way over before.

Whiles Annibal on this fide of the River, staid in giving audience to the embassages of the Gauls, the conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the mean while, Mago and the horfemen, after they had passed the river, marched one days journey apace toward the enemies at Placentia. And Annibal (few days after) encamped himfelf flrongly fix miles from Pla- English miles. centia: and the morrow after in the fight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them as appeared in offer of battel. The night following there was a petty massacre committed in the Romans camp before in this by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garboil and tumult, then the harm indeed For book. about 2000 footmen, and 200 horsemen, having slain the warders at the gates; fled away to Annibal: whom he spake courteously unto, and when he had drawn them on, inhope of great gifts and rewards he dismissed every one into his own City and Country to sollicit and perswade their countrimento fide with him. Scipio taking that maffacre as a foretoken and overture to the Gauls revolt in general; and supposing, that now being once guilty and tainted with this offence, they would in a madness run all to take arms and rife. Although still he were fore of his late wound, yet the night following at the relief of the fourth watch, he marched filly, and removed his camp neer the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hills, that were more troublesom for men of arms. But he wrought not so closely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as he did at Tieinus. For Annibal having tent out, first, the Numidian light Horie, and then all his Cavalry; without question had disordered and endammaged the rereward, but that the Numidians for greediness of prey and booty, diverted aside, and turned into the tents, abandoned and for laken of the Romans. Where, whiles they spent time in ransacking and risling every corner of the camp (and when all was done, could find no pillage worth the flay) the enemy escaped their hands. And

G when as they had espied that the Romans were newly got over Trebia, and pirched out a plot for a camp, they intercepted a few of them that lingred about the river, and flew them. Scipio not able now to abide any longer the grief and pain of his wound, by reason of the shaking and shogging of his body as he travelled, and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Conful his Collegue, (whom he heard already to be fent for out of Sieily) chose out a place neer theriver which seemed most safe for to encamp in, and it he fortified. Annihal also lay not far off incamp; who as he was proud upon the late battel of horsemen, so was he perplexed for want of victuals, which scarcity encreased upon him every day more and more, as he travelled through the enemies country, finding in no place provision aforehand. Whereup-H on, he went to Classidium, a town wherein the Romans had bestowed and laid up great flore of grain: where, as he prepared with violence to force the town, there appeared some hope of treason, by corrupting of P. Prundisinus, the captain of the garrison there, and that with no great fum of money; for in confideration only of 400, peeces of gold given unto him, Claffidian was betraved unto Annibal: the very florehouse and garner of corn that the Carthaginians had all the while they were in leaguer neer Trebia. Upon those prisoners that were taken when the garrison and fort was betrayed he exercised no cruelty because that in the beginning of his affairs he would win himfelf a name and opinion of clemency.

Whiles the war by land continued thus at Trebia, there had been some warlike exploits atchie- I ved both by fea and land about Sicily, and the Islands that lie against Italy neer unto it, both by Sempronius the Conful, and also before his coming. Twenty gallies with five ranks of Oars. and a thousand armed men, were sent from the Carthaginians to invade and waste the coasts of Time. ly. Nine of them arrived at * Lipara: eight fell with the Island of * Vulcan, and three were dis * Lipare, one of the Islands ven by tempelt into the fraights of Sicily. Against them being descryed within kenning, there were twelve ships let out from * Meffana, by Hiero King of the Saracusians, who hapned at that *Vulcano, ano- time to be in Messana attending the Roman Conful his coming; and without any resistance made he boorded those three ships and brought them away into the Haven of Messina. By those that were taken priloners, it was known, that befides the twenty ships aforeigld, fent against Italy to which Fleet they were) 35 gailies of five course of Oars, made fail for Sicily, to follicit and per-K swade the old allies there to revolt, Item, that the especial point and design that they shot at was City in Sicily. to feize upon * Lilybaum: but they thought verily that by the same gust or tempest wherein they were scattered, that other Fleet also was cast upon the Island Egares. And according to this intelligence, the King from M fa a writeth to Amylius the Roman Pretor or Governor of Sicily adthe Eye of Sicivifing him to keep a throng garrifon in Lilybeum: whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels shout the Pretor, were tent from him with all speed to all the Cities about, to give order, that their people might be in readines, to keep good ward, and above all, to hold Lilybaum fure. And for preparation of war, there went forth a proclamation, that the failers and marriners should bring into the ships ten days provinon of victuals and meat ready dressed, to the end that upon the fie nal given at an hours warning, without all delay, they should a shipboord: Also that all that dwelt I along the coast, should from their sentinels, watch-towers, and beacons, espy when the enemies fleet approached. Now (aihert the Carthaginians of purpose stayed the course of their ships, that they might come just before day to Lilybaum) they were discovered, both for that the Moon shone all night and also be ause they came under sail which they had hoised up. So foon therefore as the fignal was given out of the Sentinels and watch-towers, & alarm cried in the rown, the mariners were foon imbacked the fourtiers also were bestowed, some to man and guard the wals, and guard the gates, others toter e in the ships. But the Carthaginians perceiving, they were to deal with them that were provided for them, (as being advertised of their coming) forbare to enter the havenuntil day, and imployed the time in firiking fails, in untackling their ships, and preparing them for a battel. When it was broad day light, they retired into the deep, to have fea room e-M nough to fight and that the enemies ships might have free egress out of the haven. The Romans for their part refused not battel, comforting themselves with the remembrance of the valiant exploits performed in that very place, and truffing also upon the number and valour of their fouldiers. They were not fo foon lanched into the open leadout the Romans were defirous to grapple, and to come close to hand fight: but contrariwise, the Carthaginians held off aloof, willing to proceed by cumping and policy more then by strength and meer force; and to make trial rather of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, then either of the prowels of men, or goodness of armor: for as their Fleet was sufficiently turnished, and to the full, with a multiude of marriners, lo was it ill provided of fouldiers; and where foever they grappled together, and came to hand-fight, they had not an equal number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once N perceived, the Romans gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reason of their number; the other fide again were discouraged and out of heart, for their default of fouldiers. Infomuch as seven Carthaginian gallies were soon invested round and boorded, the rest sled. Of souldiers and marriners together, 1700, were in them taken; amongst whom, there were three great Gentlemen of Carthage. The Roman fleet flill entire and whole, fave one veffel only that was bouged and pierced (yet able to be brought back) returned into the haven.

Presently after this battel, and before that they of Messana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempromins the Conful arrived at Meffana; and as he entred within the found King Hiero met him, with a fleet well furnished and richly decked and coming forth of his royal ship into the Admiral of the Con uls, he welcomed him, and rejoyced for the fafe return of his men and flips, and pray-o ed God that his voyage into Sicily might prove happy and fortunate. Then thewed he unto him the present estate, and the affairs of the Island; opened the designments of the Car liaginians; and premifed withal, that with as good a mind and found heart as in the former war against the Carthaginians, when he was a young man, he had aided the people of Rome; so nowin his old age he would affift them: and for proof hereof, he would of his own free coff furnish both the Confuls legions, and also the marriners with corn and rayment. Among other matters he enformed him how Lilybaum, and other Cities on the lea coast were in great danger, by reason of

A some among them that desired a change and alteration. Whereupon the Consul thought good to make no delay, but to fet fail with all ipeed to Lilybaum, whom the King and his royal fleet accompanied: and as they were failing, tidings came of the foresaid battel before Lilybaum, and how the enemies ships were either scattered and put to flight, or boorded and taken.

The Conful having bid King Hiero adieu, with his fleet (etfail from Lilybaum, leaving behind him the Pretor to detend the coast of Sicily, and crossed the sea himself to the Island * Melita, * Milla, which was held by the Carthaginians. At whose coming, Amilear the son of G seo, Captain of the garrifon there, rendered himself, and 2000, souldiers within a very few, together with the Town and the Island. From whence, within few days he returned to Llybatam: where the primers

B (excepting certain noble persons of high parentage) were by the Contul and the Pretor both sold openly in port-fale. When the Contul thought Sicils on that coast fure enough, he fet fail from thence towards the Mands of Vulcan, for that the bruit went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay at road: but there were no enemies to be found about those Islands: for it chanced they were already passed over to waste along the river and coast of Italy; and having for raged the territory of * Vibo, they put the City also in great fear, As the Consul returned backagain to Sicily, tidings a nivena, or came that the enemy had made rodes into the country of Vibona: and he received letters also from Vibona. the Senat, concerning the coming of Annibal into Italy, and therefore that he should with all speed possible aid and succour his Collegue. The Consulbeing at once troubled with many cares, presently embarked his army, and by the Adriatick sea, sent them away to " Ariminum, To Sext,

C Pomponius his Lieutenant, he gave the change of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territory of Vibo, and the sea-coast of Italy, With M. Emplus the Pretor he lest a seet augmented to the pumber of fifty fail : which done, and all things fee in order in Sicily, himself with tenships coafted along Italy, and arrived at " Ariminum, from whence he put himself in his journey, and marched with one army to the river Trebia, where he joined with his fellow Conful, Now were both Confuls, and the whole puissance and force of the Romans opposed against Annibal, so and appeared plainly, that either with that power the Empire of Rome might be defended or elie all their hope was gone, Howbeit one of the Confuls being weakned and discouraged with the defeat of his horsemen in one battel and dismayed bendes with the furthe had received in his body, defired to have the right deferred: but the other coming fresh and lusty, and therby more hardy, would D abide no delay.

It fell out to at that time that the Gauls inhabited all the Country between the two rivers Trebia and Po: who whiles these two most puissant nations were at strife and warred, held off as neuters, and favoured neither fide, making full account of the good will and grace of that parr which should have the better. The Romans because they would now make no fitr, and have no more irons in the fire, took the matter well enough: but Annibal was very much thereat offended, giving out very often, that he was fent for by the Gauls for their deliverance and liberty. Upon this indignation and displeasure, and for that also he would seed his men with booties, he commanded 2000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen, most of them Numidians, and some Gauls among to overrun and spoil all the country forward, even to the banks of Po. The Gauls standing in need Fof help, and having until that time kept themselves in doubtful tearms, were forced to turn from those that offered them wrong, and to encline and cleave unto the Romans that should revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they fent Embaffadors to the Confuls, requesting the Romans help for their land, which by reason of the exceeding fidelity, and too much to iatry of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the cause, ingreet the time to deal in such affairs: he had the nation befides in suspicion and jealousie, as well for mamy treacherous parts, as also (in case he would or could forget all other lewd pranks of theirs) for the same disloyalty and falshood of the Boians. Sempronius contrariwise thought it the wielt bond to keep their allies in faith and allegeance, to defend those that came first to band and fide with hm. But nowithstanding his Collegue cast doubts and held off, yet he sent his own F Cavalry, and a thouland well neer of footmen darters amongst them, to guard the country of Dard beyond Trebia: who coming suddenly upon the enemies, and charging them at unawares, as they came scattered afunder; and out of order yea, and most of them laden with spoil, mightily affrighted them, and made a foul flaughter and pursued them in flight, as far as to their flanding tamp, and corps de guard. From whence (nevertheless) they were beaten back by the multitude that iffued forth : but by new succors from their own companies, they renued the fight again. The fight afterward was doubtful and variable: and although they made a faving bargain on both parts yet the common voicegave the honor of victory (fuch as it was) to the Romans rather then the e-'nemies. But no man made a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the full, then the Cof. himself. "He joyed he made his boast, that he had got the better, with the help of the same for-

G"ces, which under the conduct of the other Con'ul, came by the worfe, And now (faith he) the fouldiers are comforted and refreshed wel enough, and none there is but my brother Contui that "would have the battel deferred: who no doubt is more hen-hearted than bodily hurt; and for "the remembrance and imart of a little green wound, quaketh to hear of the field 180 of all things " cannot away with edg-tools; But we must not thus sit still here and wax aged for the pleasure of one crasse and lickly person For what reason is it, that we should drive off longer, and spend more time in vain? What other Conful expect we to make up the third? or what stray befides should we look for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italy, and well neer within the view and fight

"of the City of Rome; and it is neither Sieily nor Sardinia taken from them by conquett, nor to "Spain on this fide Iberus, which they shoot at, to win again: but that the Romans should be "thrust out of their native soil and country wherin they were born that is their drift and design. "ment. Oh how deeply (quoth he) would our Fathers figh, how heartily would they groan, "they who were wont to mannage war about the wals of Carthage, if they should see us their off-foring and children, two Confuls with Confular and roial armies in the midft of Italy, frighted thus and panting for fear within our camp? And that Annibal hath subdued and brought under his subjection ail the country between the Alps and Appenninum? These and such like speeches uttered he to his Collegue, as he fat by his beds fide, where he lay fick : thus toake he, as in an open audience, in the Cost, pavilion and all that quarter, to the fouldiers. The time also of the E-1 lection of magistrates at Rome, being so neer at hand, set him forward for fear, lett the war should be deferred unto the new Coff, and the opportunity withal, of winning all the honor to himself whiles his Collegue continued fick, pricked him on. Whereupon, for all the contradiction of Cornelius, which he nothing weighed and regarded, commandment he gave to his fouldiers to be ready to give battel anon unto the enemy. Annibal as one that knew and law well enough what was belt and fafeft for his enemy, could hardly imagin or conceive any hope to himself, that the Confuls would enterprize any thing rashly, or without advisement; but when he understood by hear-fay, that which afterwards by good proof and experience he found true, namely, that the one of them by nature was hot, halty, proud, and furious: and supposing, that he was the prouder and more furious for the late good hand he had of his forragers; made no doubt and distrust K of the happy success and issue of a battel, whensoever it should come. Marry, careful he was, that no good time and opportunity presented unto him, should be overflipt: but to try the hazzard and fortune of the field whiles the enemies fouldiers were raw and untrained; and the betterand wifer man of the two Generals, was unmeet for fervice, by reason of his wound as yet uncured; and the courage of the Gauls lufty and forward: for well he wift, that a mighty number of them would the more unwillingly follow, the further they were drawn from their own home. Amnibal, I say, hoping that by these and such like occasions, a battel would be soon offered; desirous also himself to bid battel, if the enemy staid long: and being advertised besides by the Gauls, his espials (whom he employed to hearken out and learn what he defired to know, and thought them more fure, because they served in both camps) that the Romans were ready for the L field; then began he (rafty Carthaginian as he was) to feek out a convenient place for an ambush. Now there was in the mid way between, a river running within the borders, having very high banks of either tide, and therefore lying close hidden, and all about overspred with moory weeds, with briers, brambles, and brush-wood, as for the most part, such for let places are overgrown withal. Which when Annibal in person had ridden about, and well viewed, perceiving that it would afford lurking holes handsom enough even for horsemen there to be hidden, This shall be the place (quoth he to his brother Mago) which you shall keep. Chuse therefore out of all the horse and foot a hundred lusty tall sellows of each; and see you repair with them to me at the first watch, for now is it time to take repast, and to refresh your bodies. And with that helent. out to the camp the Criers, to call the fouldiers to supper. And long it was not, but Mago was M come with his chosen men. I see (quoth Annibal) ye are goodly men of person, and sufficient, And that ye may be as able in number, as hardy in courage, elect ye also out of the Corners of of horie and iquadrons of foot, nine a piece fuch as your felves to fort withal. Mago shall shew you the ground where ye must lie in ambush you shal find the enemy as blind as beetles, altogether unacquainted with these seats a d cunning devices.

Thus Annib I having committed unto Mago a thousand horsemen and as many footmen himfelf betimes in the morning, willed the Numidian Cavalry, when they were passed over the river Trebia, to ride braving before the gates of the enemies, and by darting and shooting into their guards, to provoke and draw them forth to fight: with this ditection moreover, when the skirmish was begun, to fall off, and seem to retire by little and little, and so to train them on this side N the river, This charge had the Numidians, But the other Captains, as well offoot as horse, were commanded to let their Companies all to their breakfast: which done, to arm themselves, and with their horses ready sadied, to attend the signal of battel. Sempronius upon the alarm and hurliburly of the Numidians, as being forward and defirous of fight, first brought forth all his horsemen, and bare himse f bold and considert in that service; after that six thousand footmen; and at last, all his whole forces; and led them to a place which before he had designed and appointed in his mind. It fell out to be in Winter, about the midst of December, and a snowy day it was in those parts lying between the Alps and Apenninum. Now by reason of the rivers and moors so neer, both horse and men were exceeding cold: also for that they were hastily on a sudden, called forth taffing, and unprovided of all means against the cold, they had never a whit of heat lest in 0 them: and the neerer they came to the air and vapour of the river the sharper cold pinched and pierced them through. But when as once they followed upon the Numidiansthat gave back, and were entred into the water (which by reason of the rain that sell by night was risen brest-high) they were not so soon gotten out again of the river, but all their bodies begun to chill and be fiff again for cold that scarcely they could hold their weapons : and withal, as the day went further on, for very hunger they fainted. But Annibal his fouldiers, who in the mean time had made fires before their tents, and had oyl fent them to every company, for to supple and soften their joints

A and lims, and taken their repail, and eated at leafure; when they heard lay, that the effermes were passed the river, with hearts couragions and bodies stell and listy, take them to their weapons. and come forth to fight in ordinance of battel. The Baleares, and light armed men, to the number almost of 8000, he ranged before the standards in the front: after them he placed the footmen, better appointed and armed to the proof, even the very strength and manhood of all his forces: about the wings he fet 1 0000 horlemen, and behind those wings, he divided and appointed his Elephants both on the one fide and the other.

The Conful Sempronius feeing his horfemen following the chale on the four, and out of order; and how at unawates they were charged again by the Numidians, who upon a fudden turned and B made head upon them, founded the retreat: and when they were rallied about him, he compailfed his footmen with them. The Romans were in number 1 8000, of Allies and Latines 2000. befides the aids of the *Cenomanes: Which Nation of the Gauls only, continued faithful and true * Davide Main. to the Romans. With these forces came they into the field, and began the battel. The first charge of the skirmish was given by the Islanders of Baleares, upon whom, when the legions made head with greater violence, their light armed men were quickly brought into the wings: which was a cause that the Roman horiemen presently were sutcharged and distressed, For whereas of the infelves they were but 4000, horse, and hardly able to withstand the shock often thousand horsemen of the other, the Romans also were wearied, but most of the Carthaginians fresh and untainted: over and befides, they were overwhelmed with a cloud (as it were) of darcs, flung and C that by the Beleare Islanders: Moreover the Elephants which appeared aloft from the hindmost ends of the wings frighted the horses especially, and not only with the strange sight, but also with as uncouth a fcent and favor, made them flic every way. The battel of the Infantry was equal in courage of heart, rather then in firength of body: which the Carthaginians, (as having a little a' fore taken repair) brought fresh with them into the field: but contrariwise the Romans were lifling and weary, and for cold even flark and benummed. Howbeir their flomacks would have ferved to have held out and withflood to the end, if they might have fought with focimen onely. But both the Baleares, having difordered the horiemen, flanked them with their fhot, and also the Elephants by this time were entred into the middle battaillon of footmen; and withal, Mago and the Numidian light horse (so soon as this bartaillon was unawares gone past their am-D bushment and lurking holes) start up and arole from behind, and pur them in exceeding trouble and fright. Yet for all there inconveniencies and diladvantages (to many on every fide) the main battel a good while flood unmovable and flirred not, but kept the array, and especially (Berond the expectation of all men) against the Elephants, For certain footmen placed for the purpose, by flinging of darts forced them to turn head: and when they were once turned fromwards, they followed hard upon them, pricking and galling them under the tails, in which place by realon of the tender skin they are foon wounded. Whom when Annibal saw thus feared and ready to turn upon their own part, from the main battelto the flanks and outfides, he commanded them to be driven unto the left wing upon the Gauls that came to aid, and presently enforced them to run away. The Romans feeing their auxiliary Gauls put to flight, were driven into a new fear. Wher-E upon fighting now as it were in a ring and round on both fides, there were among them to the number also of 10000, who seeing no way else to escape, brake through the middle battaillon of the Africans, which was frengthned with the aid of the Gauls, and that with a great flaughter of their enemies : and feeing they neither could return into their camp (the river being between) nor for the rain well differn how to succour their fellows, they took the way straight to Placen-

tia. After this, thereft brake forth in all parts. They that took the river either perished in the fireams and whirl-pools : or fuch as made stay to enter, were by the enemy overtaken and flain.

But as many as here and there fled scattering through the fields, following the footing and tracks of the battaillon that retired back, came to Placentia. Some for fear of the enemy, adventured boldly to take the river, and being once over, recovered the camp. The rain and snow together, and F the incolerable cold killed many, as well men as beaffs and in manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the enemies in chase as far as Trebia, and there gave over : and returned into the camp to clumfie and frozen, as scarcely they felt the joy of their victory. By reason wherof, the nightfollowing, whenas the guard of the Roman camp, and the remnint of that great company offouldiers passed Trebia with float-boats and flat barges, the Carthaginians either perceived them not indeed for the noise the tempelluous rain made, or for weatines and fore wounds were not able to ftir, and therefore made semblance, as though they knew not of it. And so whiles the Carthaginians were at reft, the army was by Scipio the Conful brought (in a fill march) to Placentia: and from thence having croffed the Po, came to Cremona, because one Colony alone should not be charged with the wintering of two armies at one time. G Upon this defeat and overthrow, there arrived fuch fearful tidings at Rome, that they believed verily and looked for no other but that the enemy would come with banner displayed straight to the very City: and that there was no hope nor help left behind to defend their gates and walls from affault and violence. For feeing that the one Conful was vanquished at Ticinus and the other also, who was called unto him out of Sicily; fince both Confuls, and two consular armies were thus defeated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be fent for, to aid? As they were in this agony and fear, Sempronias the Confurcame home: who with very great danger had passed through the enemies Cavalty, which was spread here and there all about, to setch in booties;

and more by venturous hardiness then good advice and hope, either to miss them unespied, or to refift if he had happed upon them, he got away. And after he had held the affembly for ele-H ction of the Confuls (the only thing above all other for that present most defired) he returned into his standing camp to winter in. Now there were created Consuls, Cn. Servilins, and Cn. Elaminius the second time.

Howbeit the Romans were not in quiet within their wintering campifor the Numidian horsemen ranged about, and made excursions into every quarter, and (those who troubled and empeached them, more then they) the Celtiberians and Portugals. Whereby all convoy of victuals from every part was stopped, but only that which came by the Po, in Keels and such like vessels, Neer to Placentia there was a merchants town, both fortified ftrongly, and also well furnished t with a good garrison: upon hope to force that castle or town, Annibal went with his horse and foot, lightly armed; and supposing that to carry the matter covertly, would avail much to the effecting of his purposed enterprise, he came upon them in the night; howbeit he was not so close and secret, but he was descried by the watch : who suddenly set up such an alasm, that it was heard as far as Placentia. Whereby, the Conful fomewhat before day was there with his Cavalry, having commanded the Infantry to march on after, ranged in a square battaillon. In the mean while the horsemen skirmished, wherein Annibal was hurt, and departed out of the skirmish, by which means the enemies were frighted, and the Castle and hold manfully defended. After few days that he had taken his eale, before he was well cured of his wound, he went forward to affault Vicumvie. That was a town also of merchandize (or mart town) and had been fortified by K the Romans in the Gauls war. Whereupon, the people bordering there about on every fide, uled thither to make repair, and much frequented the same: and even then for fear of rodes and excursions many of the Peasants and rural people retired themselves thither for refuge. This multitude (fuch as they were) upon the report of the valiant holding and defence of the fort by Placentia, were encouraged, and took arms, and went forth to encounter Annibal. And in the midway they chanced to affront him and skirmish in no battel array, but as they marched disorderly: whereas they were on the one fide, none but a rude and confused fort; and on the other fide. both a Captain that might trust his fouldiers and fouldiers also that might reckon upon their Captain, there were to the number of 35000, discomfitted and put to flight, even by a few of their enemies. The morrow after, they yeelded themselves and received a garrison within the walls; and L fo foon as upon commandment to give up their armor, they had obeyed and fo done; prefently a fignal was given unto the conquerors to fack and spoil the town, as if it had been forced by affault: where there was not forgotten and omitted any calamity what loever, that might afford in fuch a case memorable matter & sufficient argument for writers to record. So pitiful examples were practifed upon the poor filly wretches, of all looiness and luft cruelty, and inhuman pride and outrage. And these were the expeditions and enterprises of Annibal atchieved for this winter time,

After this the fouldiers took repole, but no longer then the intollerable cold lasted: For immediarly upon the very first and doubtful tokens of spring; he departed from his wintring hold, and led his army into Tuscany, purposing to adjoin unto him (either by sorce or love) that nation also, as well as the Gauls and Ligurians. But as hepasted over Apenninum, there arose so terrible a M fform and tempest, and surprised him, that it surmounted well-neer the foul trouble and encumbrance endured in the Alps. For the wind and rain together did beat and drive upon their very faces. At the first, for that either they were to lay away their armor, or else in striving and labouting to march on against the weather, and by the whirl-puffs of wind turned round about, and ready to be borndown, they flood flill but when as now the violence and fury of the florm flopped their breaths, suffered them not totake their wind at will, they were fain to turn their backs, and fit them down on the ground for a time. Then see, the skie thundered amain, and made an horrible noise, and amid those terrible cracks redoubled it lightned thick. Whereupon, they lost their hearing and seeing and for fear, all of them became astonied. At length it poured down, and thereby the wind and fform encreased more forceably upon them. Whereupon they were driven N to this necessity, even to pitch their camp, even in that very place where they were so suddenly caught and overtaken tempest. But that was to them the beginning of a new toil and travels for neither could they spread and display ought, nor pitch any thing surely: neither would that which was pight down, continue and abide the wind, which rent and tare, and broke every thing, and hurried it clean away. And within a while the water that fell, and by reason of the wind was raised aloft, being congealed once upon the cold tops of the hills, turned into a kind of hail and snow together, and came upon them with such a force, that leaving all things else, the men were forced to lie along, groveling upon their faces, rather diffed and smothered, then covered with their hillings, Hereupon enfued a frost, so violent and outragious, that of that miserable and pitiful heap of men and beafts, that lay there along, there was not one for a good while could raise o and lift up himfelf when he would, by reason, that for stark cold their sinews were benummed, that they could hardly bend and bow their joints. Afterwards, at length, when with bellitting and chafing their limbs, they gat some heat, and came again to themselves, and that here and there in tome places they began to make fires; every one that had no means to todo, ran and fled to the fuccor and help of others. Thus for two days they remained there pinned up as if they had been besieged. Many a man and beast, and seven Elephants also of them that remained after the battelat Trebia, were starved and perished.

By occasion hereof, Annibal departed from Apenninus, backagain toward Placentia: and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he fat him down and encamped. The morrow after he led against the enemy 12000 soot, and 5000, horse, Sempronius the Consul also, being now returned from Rome, refused not battel: and the same day, the enemies were distant but three miles asunder. The morrow after they fought on each fide most fiercely and course oully and with variable event and fortune. At the first on iet, the Romans had the better hand, so far forth, as that not only in fight they overcame their enemies, but also after they had discomfitted them, and put them back, they chased them into their camp, and anon assailed the same, Annibal having ordained some few to defend the rampart and the gates, retired the rest thick and close together into the midst of B the camp, and commanded them to give ear, and be intentive to the fignal, when he would have them iffue forth. Now was it the * hinth hour of the day, when the Roman Conful having toiled * Three of

and wearied his fouldiers to no purpose, and seeing no hope to win the camp, sounded the retreat, the clock at-Which to foon as Annibal heard and faw the fight withal to flack and wax cold, and the enemy ter noon. retired back from the camp, presently fallied forth himself with the whole strength of his Infantry, for he had tent out his horfemen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not been lightly a more fierce and cruel barrel firucken, and more memorable, for the final mischief of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted the fray, which was hotly begun with exceeding flomack and courage. Whereupon, the confronting and charging one of another, was more eager, then the flaughter bloody between them; and C as the fight in manner was equal, so they parted with loss alike. For of each side there died above fix hundred footmen, and half as many horsemen. But the loss on the Romans side was greater than in proportion of the number, because certain of the degree and calling of Knights, and five Colonels, and three Captains of the Allies, were flain.

After this journey, Annibal went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Luca. To welcome Annibal at his first coming into Liguria, there were delivered unto him two Roman Questors or Treasurers, Cn. Fulvius, and L. Lucretius, who were intercepted by the Ligurians, & taken in a train of ambush, with two Colonels, and five others besides, whole fathers by calling were as good as Senators fellows: and this was done, because he should assure himself the better, that the peace and amity contracted with them, would be faithfully kept and observed.

Whiles these things thus passed in Italy, Cn. Scipio who was sent into Spain with a fleet and army for sea and land; having set sail from the mouth of Rhodanus, and compassed the mountains Pyrenei, arrived at a place called Emporia: where he disbarked and landed his forces, and reduced unto the Roman Empire all the country, beginning at the Lacetans, and so from thence all the sea coast as far as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing their ancient leagues, and partly by devising mens to contract new. Whereupon, there arose a great name of him for his clemency; whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the fea fide but also amongst the inlanders and mountainers, even to the nations that were more fierce & favage: with whom he not only made peace, but also wrought them so, that they took arms in his quarrel; and there were levied from among them, certain firong cohorts and bands for to aid and fuccour him. Hanno, whom Annibal had Eleft for defence of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore, before all was gone, and the country allenated, he thought good to meet with this mischief: and having pirched his camp in fight of the enemies, fet his men in ordinance of battel. The Roman Captain likewise refolved not to defer the fight; knowing that fo, he might be forced to encounter both with Hanno and Aldrubal, and rather yet he defined to deal with them one after the other fingle, than at once with both But this battel was not so much dangerous. Six thousand enemies were left behind flain, and two thousand taken priloners, together with those that were left for the guard of the camp. For both the camp was forced and won, and also the General himself with certain guards was taken prifoner. Moreover Stiffum, a town neer unto the camp, was won by affault: howbeit, the spoil and pillage of the town were matters of small worth and value; namely, the houshold It fluff, and fuch pelf and trumpery of barbarous people, and certain poor base slaves. It was the camp that enriched the fouldiers: by reason that not only the army which was now vanquished, but that also which with Annibal served in Italy, and left behind them about Pyrenens, all good things to speak of, that they set store by, because they would go lightly, and not be encumbred with carriages. Before any certain report of this overthrow came to Afdrubal, he had passed over Iberus with 8000, footmen, and 1000, horsemen, as purposing to make head against the Romans at their first coming: but when he heard how the field was lost, and the camp withal, he turned his journey to the fea And not far from * Tarracon, he found the fouldiers of the Armado, * Tarragona. and the marriners befides, wandring and firagling over the fields (for usual it is, that happy fuccels should breed careless negligence) whereupon he sent out his horsemen every way, and with G great flaughter and flight he chaled them to their ships: and not adventuring to make any longer flay thereabout, for fear to be furprised of Scipio, he retired backto the other fide of Iberus. Sciple also upon the first report of these new enemies, having fallied his forces together in great hafte, after he had flightly chastifed a few Captains, and left behind him a small garrison at Tarracon, returned with his fleet to Emporia, He had no sooner departed from thence, but Asdrubal was there in his place; and having induced and incited the State of the Ilergetes (who had given hoftages to Scipio) for to revolt and rebel, even with their own youth walted the territories of all those that continued faithful confederates to the Romans. Afterwards, when Scipio was roused once out of the place where he wintered, the enemy retired again, and quit all the country on that side Iberus. Then Scipio having in hostile manner invaded the countries, abandoned and lest by him that was the author and canse of their rebellion, and by that means the nation likewife of the Hergetes, after he had driven them all within Athanagia, which is their capital town, he laid fiege unto it round about, and within few days brought the whole feignory of the Ilergetes under under his obedience : and besides a greater number of hostages then before (which they were constrained to deliver) he condemned them in a good round sum of money. From thence he went forward against the Ausetanes, neer to Iberus, being affociats also to the Carthaginians: and having beleaguered their City, he fore-layed and intercepted the Lacetans as they came by night to succour their neighbors, not far from the town, even as they were at the point I to enter in. There were flain of them 12000, and the rest being well-neer all disarmed, sled every way scattering here and there over the fields home to their houses. All the help and desence that they had who were within, was only the foul and cold winter weather, evermore naught and hurtfulto affailants that lie forth. The fiege lasted thirty days, during which time, seldom fell the snow less then sour soot deep, and so covered the pentises and mantilets of the Romans, that when the enemies flung firelundry times thereupon, that alone faved the same & nothing else, In the end, upon the departure of their Prince Amursitus, who was fled to Asdrubal, they yeelded, upon condition to pay twenty talents of filver, & fo Scrpio returned to Tarracon, there to winter. But that year, at Rome and about the City, were many strange and prodigious signs seen, or at leastwise (a thing usual when mens minds are once touched with religion, and given to make X feruple) many were reported, and foon beleeved. Among which, this was one; that a babe of condition free born, and but half yeer old, cried with a loud voice in the herb market Io Tris mohe.

Pretor, was commanded to pronounce afolemn vow, in case the Common-weal continued in the same good estate, ten years, and decayed not. These portentous prodigies thus expiated, and vows made according to Sibyls books, eased mens hearts mightily of their religious sear. Then sword out of his scabbard, and carried it away. For other prodigious tokens, order was given to the Decemvirs to peruse the books of Sibylla. But for the raining of stones in Picenum, there was ordain a Novendial feast for nine days: and for the expiation of the other prodigies, the whole City in manner was occupied in their devotions. And now above all other things the City was solemnly purged, and greater beasts killed in sacrifice in the honor of shose gods, for whom they wintered at Placentia, fent an Edict with Letters to the Conful, that the Army should bein camp at Ariminum, upon the * Ides of March. His putpole was, to enter into his Consulship in the Province, remembring the old contentions and debates which he had with the Nobles, N first when he was a Tribun of the Commons, and afterwards when he was Conful, as well about the Consulfhip (of which, they would have deprived him) as also, about the triumph, which they denied him. Hated he was besides of the Senat, for the new Act or Law, which Q. Claudius (a Tribun of the Commons) had made, so prejudicial to the Senat; and only C. Flaminius) of all the Nobles, supported it and set it forward:namely, That no Senator, or father of a Senator, should have a Ship at Sea, bearing above * 300. Amphores: forthat was thought sufficient to transport their commodities and fruits to Rome, rifing out of their Lands and livings. And as for all other gain by traffick, it was not beseeming a Nobleman and Senator. This matter having been debated with great contention, caused the proposer of this law (Flaminian) to incur much evil will and displeature with the Nobility, but it procured him the affection and love of the Commons, and in O process of time a fecond Consulfhip, Supposing therefore, that with iterating the Auspices, and putting him to take the prefages anew by the flight of birds, and by finding other delays, upon occasion of the Latine holy days, and one business or other belonging to the Consuls charge, they would detain and keep him back ftill in the City; he fet a countenance, as though he would take a journey like a private person, and so departed secretly into the Province. Which things when it was once blazed abroad, made the Nobles who were afore malicionfly bent against him, to be angry anew; and they gave out, that it was not the Senat only, that C. Flaminius warred againft, but the immortal Gods allo. For he, who before time had been made Cof, without regard of taking Ampices, and having the appropriation of the hads, when he was reclaimed and called both by God and man out of the field, obeing not; and now, having a heavy conficience, furcharged with offences patt, hath fled from the Capitol and the folemn nuncupation and making of vows, for that he would not upon the ordinary day of entring his Magistracy, visit the Temple of Jup. Ou. Max, nor (because he was odious to the Senat, and they likewise bated of him alone) fee them, and ask their advise and counsel; nor proclaim the Latin Holy-dayes, and celebrate to Jup. Latidie, the folemp yearly factifice apporting Alban Hill: nor yes, after he had entred into the Capitol by the lucky flight and token of birds, pronounce his yows there, and depart from R thence in his rich coat-armor toward the Province. They laid moreover, that he was flipt and folniecretly away like a drudge that followeth the camp, without the enfigns and ornaments of authority, without Sergeants and Officers, as if he had been banished, and so left his country, minding belike to enter his government more for the honor and dignity of Ariminum than of Rome, and to put upon him his purple robe of effate, embroided with scarlet rather in an hostelty, and common Inne, than in his own house. They all every one opined and judged that he should be recalled and brought back again peremptorily, yea, and be forced personally at home to perform all duties belonging to God and man, before that he went forth to the Province and to the army, About this embellinge (for they thought meet to fend Embaffadors) went Q. Terentius, and M. Antistin: but they prevailed no more than in his former Consulfhip the letters missive had done, c which were fent from the Senat. A few dayes after he entred his office, and as he was faciliting, the Cast or young Bullockbeing already trickt got away from the hands of the facrificers, and spotted many of the standers by with blond. But they that stood far off, not knowing what the matter was of that ftir, fled away, and ran to and fro: which of most men was judged a foretoken and prelige of some great affright and trouble. After this, when he had received the two legions of Sempronius the Conful of the year before, and other two, of C. Attilius the Pretor, he beganto conduct his army into Tufcany by the way of Apenninum.

Nnibal came into Herruria, after he had lost one of his eyes by occasion of continual watching in A the marihes, through which he marched four dayes and three nights, without taking his repole & fleep. C. Flaminius the Conful a rash and inconsider at man, went forth, contrary to the warrant and apfirep. C. riaminustrie Conju. a ray ana-novnjuorus man, went joren yours my rorne marrant and ap-prob tion of the Asspires, and caused the sield-ensignt to be dugged out of the ground, when otherw se they could not be plucked up: and being mounted on Horsel ack, fell with his head forwa d from his horse. His fortune was to be surprised in an ambush by Aunibal, which he had laid for him neer the Luke called Thrasymenus: where he and his army were defented, and fell upon the edge of the sword. Six cauca interpretation where we amount in made an efeape; now it flanding the faithful prome to that thousand Romans, who brake through and made and them; were by the fallhood of Annibal pact in prijon. When upon the news of this overthrem, there was great mourning and foreign at Rome, there fortuned two mothers to die for very joy, that beyondsheir hope and expectation, they recoursed their joins, and fan them alive, whomshey E Supposed to binie been flain in that field. Invegina of the forefaid defeat, there was vomed a sucred fring, according to the bloks of Sibylla. After this, when Q Fabius Maximus the Dittator fent against Acmbal, would not come to a fet buttel with him, for few he fooded hazard in fight the fouldiers lately tremous, roma no come u ages vascerous among principal and proud of fo many victories, and by rife and daunted with adverse overshrows as airly archemy suff and proud of fo many victories, and by making head, and opposing himself only against Annibal, empeached his attempts and enterprises. H tor, to the end, that he might bring him suto suspicion of treason to the State, After this, when Emylins Paulus, and Terencius Tarro were Confuls and Generals of the army, there was a battel fought mith Annibal, to their exceeding loffe and inter overshrow, neer unto a village called Canna. At which field there were flain of Ramans, 45000, together with Paulus the Conful, and fourfere Senators, befider thirty other brave per fonages that had been Confuis or Pretors, or at leaftwife Adiles of State. After this d feat, when the noble young Gentlemen of the City (for very defpair of the State) were in counselts abandon Italy, P. Cornelius Scipio (a Colonel, who afterwards was furnamed Affricanus) held his meked fword over their heads, as they fat in confuttation, and fware a great outh, that he would repute him for a mortal enemy that would not swear after him : and hereby effected thus much at their hands, that by vertue of an oath, they obliged themselves not to depart out of Italy and for sake their native country This book containeth besides, the fright and lament ation made within the City and the affairs and exploits atchieved in Spain, with more happy fuccefs, Opitha and Fesonia, two professed vestal Virgini, weie convicted of Incest, and condemned. TOW approached the spring, when Annibal removed out of his wintering holds, after he had affaved before to pais over the Agennine, but in vain, by reason of the intolerable cold; where also he stayed in great sear and danger of his own person. By which time, the Gauls, who having rifen up in arms on his ide, for hope of spoil and pillage, feeing now in flead of harrying and carrying away of booties out of other mens Lands, that their own country was become the place of the war troubled and molefled as we I with the one army as the other which abode there all winter turned their hatred and malice from the Romans back again upon Annibel : In fuch fort, as after he had been jundsy times forelaid by the fecret trains of their Princes, and in danger to be murdred, he escaped only by the deceiptiulness and fallhoods practifed among their own felves. For with what inconfrancy and levity they had confpired together, with the same they bewrayed one another and detected the conspiracy unto him. By mean whereof, as also by changing one while his apparrel, another while the bonet and attire of his head, by errour alio and mistaking, he avoided the peril, and saved himself. But so it was, that even this fear in which he flood, caused him to remove the sooner out of his wintering harbour,

About the same time Cn. Servilius entred into his Confulship at Rome, on the Ides of March where, after he had propounded to the Senat concerning the affairs of the Common-weal, the hatred and malice which the LL. had conceived against C. Flaminius, was renewed afresh. For they faid, that they created two Confuls, and had but one. For that lawful government and atthority which Flaminius should have had, that auspice of Magiltracy which was meet and due, he ought to have carried with him from the City, from the publick and private habitations, after he had celebrated the Latin holy-dayes, and offred factifice upon the mountain Altan, and made his solemn vows accordingly, within the Capitol. But since for default herein, he departed from the City a private person, the Ampices of government could not follow and accompany him : and being gone without them, he might not lawfully take the fame anew in forrein foil. Now there were fundry strange prodigious tokens besides, reported from many places at once, which mich encreased their fear: namely, that in Sieily certain fouldiers javelins were on fire: and in Sadinia, a Horsemans walking staff, as he went the round, and visited the watch upon the wall, burned in his hand : That upon the fix and and Sea shore, there were seen many light fires, so as all the coasts shone again withal: That two shields sweat blood : That there were some foulditry smitten dead with lightning: That the circle and body of the sun appeared in sight less in compais and eclipied: Also, that there fell from the skye burning stones, at Preneste: And at Arp there were feen in the Element, Paim or Date Trees: and the fun fighting with the moon: Moreover, at Capena two moons arole and shewed in the day time: that at Cere, the waters ran mingled with blood: That the very fountain of Hercules yeelded and cast up water besported with blood: That as folk reaped in Autium fields, certain bloody ears of corn light into their baskets: At Faleris the heaven seemed to cleave in funder and open, and to shew as it were a great chink; and out of the place where it gaped, there shone a great light: That the lots of their own felves diminished, and one fell out of the pitcher, with this inscription, Mars brandifies hand for keth his fpear. And about the same time or Rome the Statue of Mars sweet in the high way Apple, o neer to the images of the wolves : and at Capua the welkin feemed to be on fire, and the form a moon to fall down in a rain or shower. After this, mengave belief also to prodigies of ar less importance: namely, that some mens goars, in stead of hair bare wooll: that a hen turned into a cock, and a cock proved to be a hen. These things as folk reported, were declared abroad, and the authors brought into the Senat: where the Conful propounded before the L.L. and required their advice, as southing matters of Religion. Whereupon, there passed a decree that these strings tokens, some should be purged and explated with greater sacrifices, other with young sucklings

and that for three dayes, there should be supplications at all the Shrines and Altars of the Gods. As for other matters, afterthat the Decemvirs had looked into their books, such provision was to be made, as the Gods in their veries should foretel to stand with their pleasure and contentment. So, by the advettisements and directions of the Decemvirs it was decreed as followeth: First, and foremost, that to Jupiter there should be made of gold a thunderbolt or form of lightning weighing * 50 pounds, and another of filver, presented unto Juno and Minerva, Item to Juno * 1800 liftin Regina there should be facrifice offred in the mount Avenue, and to Iuno Hofpita in Lanuvium, of greater healts: Item, that the dames of Rome, making a contribution (every one to their avility) of a ium of money, should offer an Oblation anto Juno Regina and bring it into Aventine, and R there solemnise a Lectistern: Item, that the very Libertin or entranchised women also, should according to their power, lay their money together and make a p. elent for the godde is Feronia. These things accomplished, the Decemvirs sacrificed in the market place of Ardea, and for that purpose killed greater bealts. Last of all, by direction out of the books of Sybilla, now in the month December, they celebrated a facrifice at Rome in the Temple of Saturn: and commandment was given that a Lectitern should be solemnized (which bed and table the Senators themfelves spred and set out with all the furniture) and a publick feats bendes, in any hand: and throughout the City both by day and night were proclaimed the solemn Saturnaha: and order directed, that the people should hold and observe that day, as holy and festival, for ever,

Whiles the Contul was bufied at Rome in pacifying the Gods, and levying fouldiers, Annibal C (who was departed from his wintering fort, because the rumor ran that Flaminius the Consul was come as far as Aretium) albeit he faw another way more ready and commodious (though it were somewhat farther about) yet choic that which was the neerer through the matishes, whereas the River Arnus at the same time had overflowed his banks more than usually. As for the Spaniards, Affricans, and all his old beaten fouldiers (the very flower and strength of his army) he commanded to march formost together with all their baggage and cariages among them, to this end, that if they were forced any where to stay, they should not fail and want necessaries about them: the Gauls he appointed to follow next: and because he was desirous that those kind of people, should be in the middle ward, and the Horsemen likewise to go after them hindmost in the reregard, he charged Mago with the light Horsemen of the Numidians, to guard the army D and keep them cloie together in their march, but especially to have an eye to the Gauls, and keep them in, for fear lest they for tedionsness of travail, and weariness of long way (as they are a Nation tender enough and not able to abide any hardness) should either slink away, or else stand fill. They of the vantguard what way toever the guides led them and went afore, passed through thick and thin, waded through great Rivers and deep quicklands; and albeit they were mired and in a manner overwhelmed and swallowed up of bogs and muddy quagmires, yet they followed Aill their colours. But the Gauls, if their feet chanced, to flip, could not hold themselves, and when they were down, they were not able to arite out of the durty floughs and holes : neither could any of them comfort his corps with contage, nor help his heart with hope of better. Some of them hardly haled their heavy hams, and drew with much adoe their lazie legs and lagging E lims after them: others, whose hearts were done for tedious toil and travail, when they were once down, lay dying amongst the jades and other beasts, which also were conched along every where. But that which hurt and undid them most, was their want of sleep, for they had watched four dayes and three nights continually without a wink. Now when as the water had to covered and overspred every place, that they could find no drieground, to lay their wearied bodies on, they were fain to pile their packs one upon another in the waters, and to cast themselves alost upon them. All the way as they went, they might see the beasts and Horses lie every where on heaps overthrown and dead: which terved them a while, inflead of Couches for want of other means, who fought but only for some thing or other, that appeared above water to repose themselves upon, for to take a nap. As for Annibal himself, (who had already an infirmity in his eyes, p which came first by the distemperature of the spring season, now hor and then cold he was mounted upon an Elephant, the only Elephant that was left alive: this beaft bare him a good way above the water: but by reason that he had overwatched himself, and the moist nights besides together with the damp and milt of the foggy fens stuffed his head and filled him full of the wms, and because neither time nor place served for any cure and to take Physick, he lost one of his eyes

Thus after many a man loft, many a Horse piteously perished, when he was got out at length of these soul sens and miry manishes, in the first dry ground that he came unto, he pitched his camp: and was certified by his espials and vantcourriers whom he had sent out before, that the Roman army, lay about the walls of Aretings. Then with great diligence and careful enquiry he G endeavoured, to found the intern and the defigns of the Conful; to know the coasts and fite of the country; to hearken what waves he travailed; to learn what forces he had; to be advertifed how he was flored and provided of victuals; and to understand all other things expedient for his purpole in such a case, and necessary to be known. The countrey was most fertile and fruitul, as any one in all Italy, to wit, the goodly champian fields of Tufcany, lying between Fefule, and Aretium, plentiful in corti, abundant in cattel, and richly flored with all good things. The Conful was from and proud, by reason of the former Consulfhip that he had born: little account hemade of the Majefly of Laws, and anthority of Senators, and as small regard and reverence he had of the Gods themselves: which rashness, as it cost him nought, but was ingraffed's in him by nature. fo fortune had nourished and mainteined the same with prosperous success in his affairs at home, and wars abroad; fo as it appeared evidently, that fince he respected neither God nor man, and deigned not to take their counsel and advice, he would go rashly to work. and do all in hast, hand over hand, without discretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himself headlong into these his infirmities and impersections, Annibal devised to anger him, and to move his patience. Leaving the enemy therefore on his left hand, he put him. fell into the way to Fejula for to wast and spoil the country of Tuscany; and shewed to the Conful a far off, what foul work and havock he possibly could make, with fire and sword. Then Flaminius, who of himself would not have rested and sate still, in case Annibal had been quiet; feeing once the goods of his allies and friends, harried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his shame and dishonor, that a Carthaginian should march thus at his pleasure, through the mids of Italy, and without any empeaching and controulement, to pass on forward, even to befrege and affault the walls of Rome; when all others about him fitting in counfail, gave advice for profit and fafety, rather than for shew and bravery; namely, to paule awhile, and expect the coming of his Colleague, that they might with joynt armies, with one heart, and with common accord of counfel, conduct and manage the war; and in the mean time, with the Cavalry, with Auxiliary or aid-fouldiers lightly armed, repress the enemy, and stay him from spoiling so licentiously at his pleasure; in a great chase and choler he rose up, and departed out of the Councel, and prefently founded the march, and gave the fignal of battail : and withal, g "Nay we were best (quoth he) to remain and fit here still before the walls of Aretium : for this, be like, is our native countrey, and here is our place of habitation: as for Annibal, let him descape forth of our hands, and wast all Italy; let him spoil afore him, and over-run all with fire "and fword, until hebe as far as Rome walls : and let not us, in any case once stir from hence, be-"fore that the Senators fend for C. Flaminius from Aretium, as sometimes they called Camillan "from Veii. With these and such like reproachful and taunting words, he commanded in all half the standards and enfigns to be plucked up, and called for his Horse. He was not so soon mounted on his back, but the Horse fell presently, cast the Rider over and over with his his head forward; and there lay Flaminius the Conful under foot. As they all, that attended about him, were affrighted and troubled in mind, at this unlucky prefage and fore-token, in the very beginning of i his enterprise; word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the port-enfigns was not ble to pull up his enfign, do what he could, and putting his whole firength unto it. The Confulturning to the messenger, What? hast thou any letters besides (quoth he) from the Senat, to prohibit me for giving battail? go thy wayes, and bid them dig up the enfign, with help of spade and mattock, if their hands be so benummed for sear, that they can not pluck it up: and with that began the army to march. The principal Leaders and Captains, besides that they agreed not, but gainfaid this course, were much difmayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious fign: but the common fouldiers rejoyced and took great pleasure, to see this forwardness and animosity of their General: having an eye rather to the end of their hope, than to the cause which they had to hope io. Now Annibal wasted in all manner of hostility that he could devise, the territories between the Town Cotona, and the lake Thrasymenus, and all to whet the edge of the Confuls flomack, to chase his hot bloud, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harms and wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And come already they were to certain places, naturally made as it were for an ambush, whereas the lake Thrasymenus lieth hard at the foot of the Hills of Cortoma: for there is between, but a very straight and narrow passage, as if there had been left so much space of ground, only for that purpose, and nothing else. For if a man go but a little surther, the plain lieth more open, and groweth larger, and from thence the hills begin to arife aloft. Annibal in the open ground pitched his camp, for himfelf with his Africans only and the Spaniards to lodge in, and made abode. The Balearians, and the other light armed fooldiers; he led about behind the Mountains: the Horsemen he placed at the very gullet of the streight passage, where N the little hills handsomely covered and hid them close; to the end that so soon as the Romans were entred in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the streight, all might be enclosed within the lake and the Mountains. Flaminius being come to the lake the day before at the Sunsetting; the morrow after, before it was full day light, without discovering and cleering the coasts by any scouts and espials sent out before, passed through the streights. After that his army began to be spread and displayed more at large, as the plain opened wider, he espied and perceived those enemies only which he had before his face: for the ambushes lay close hid-The battail at den, both behind his back, and over his head. Annibal having once got the enemy (as he would) enclosed thus within the lake and the Mountains, and environed with his forces, gave the fignal to them all for to charge: who came down every man the neerest way he could: and o so much the more were the Romans affrighted and troubled with this sudden occurrent, by reafon that the mist which arose out of the lake, was settled thicker in the plain, than upon the hills: whereby the Companies and Squadrons of their enemies coming out of many Vallies, were feen well enough one of another, and therefore more joyntly gave the charge all at once together. The Romans hearing the cry and shour which arole from all parts, before they could well difcern and see, perceived themselves compassed all about and surprised, and were assailed both affront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themselves in battail-ray, as they ought, make

C and law well, that on both fides and flanks the mountains and the lake; that afront and behind, the enemies battailons hemmed them in; then they knew evidently there was no hope of life but in their right hand and force of arms. Then every man became a Captain, and encouraged himfelf to fight manfully: so as the batteril began afresh, not in order by the Principes, Hast ati, and Triarii, nor according to the accustomed manner, whereby the vanguard should fight before the main battail and the standards, and behind them the reregard, and that the fouldier should keep his ownlegion, his own cohort, band, and company; but at a venture, even as it hapned, so they went to it and buckled, pell mell: and as every mans heart served him, to he marshalled himself to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animosity was so ardent, their spirits and minds so intentive to the battel, that being as there was, a terrible earthquake at the very instant, D which overthrew and turned upfide down, a great part of many Cities in Italy, tutned afide the couries of great Rivers out of their channels, and dravetheir streams against the current, forced the Sea into fresh Rivers, yea, and overturned Mountains with mighty fals, and laid them flat; yet there was not a man who fought in that battail, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict lasted almost three hours. Sharp it was in every place, but about the Consul most cruel: and look in what part soever he saw his men distressed and in hazard, there courageously he aided them. By reason that the flower and bravest gallants followed him, and was himself for: his own person goodly beseen in his rich armour, he both affilled the enemy most furiously, and alio defended his own citizens as valiantly; so long, until a certain Insubrian, a man of arms (Ducarius was his name) one that knew his vitage well enough, This is (quoth he) to his coun-E try-men, the Consulthat deseated our army, put to the sword our Legions, wasted our territories, and he that destroyed and sacked our City. Now will I offer him as a sacrifice out of hand to the gholts and spirits of those our fellow citizens, who by his means have been piteously slain: and therewith setting spirs to his Horse, he rode through the thickest troop and presse of his enemies : and when he had first slain his Esquier outright (who opposed his body between, and etchimical against him, seeing him coming so surriously he ran the Consol quite through the body with his lance. And when he would rather than his life have distarmed and risted him, the Triaris stept, with their targuets over his corps, and so kept him off. Hereupon from hence first many began to flie ; but anon, neither deep lake nor high mountain, could impeach and flop their fearful flight: like blindmen they ran and lought means to make escapes; were the lane never so F parrows, were the Hills never to fleep and craggy, horse and man, man and armour, fell headlong one upon another. A number of them feeing no way afte to escape, entred into the Like by the first edges and shallow brims thereof, waded so far, and went up so high; that they left their heads and shoulders, onely above the water. Somethere were, who madvifedly (such was their fear) fought to lave themselves by swimming. Which being an endiels piece of work, and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them, they were either stifled and swallowed up of the gulfs, or after that with too much half, they had over-laboured and toiled our themselves, they did what they could to swim back again; and with much ado to recover the Land: and there, by the enemies Horfemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in pieces. Six thouland or thereabout, of the vanguard, who infilly brake through C the mids, mangre the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, escaped fate out so the golder, and having ferzed the top of a littlehill, there they flood, and might hear only the outches of ment she rating and ruftling found of their armor, but how the battel went of fped, neither could they know, nor yet differn for the thickness of the dark mift. But now, when they were come to some ods, and one side went down and had the worse, by which time the heat of the fun had broken and dispatched the mift, and the bright day appeared; then through the slear lights the hills and dales shewed evidently, the havockes overthrow that was made, and how Hh 3

shouts and shrikes of hardy and fearful men one with another, they turned their faces, and calk

their eves every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the press of those that were fight-companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had affayed in vain every way to get forth,

R ly,neither counsel nor command could be heard: and so far off were the souldiers from knowing the Roman army was fouly discomfitted and defeated. For fear therefore, that the enemy (having H descried and seen them a tar off) should send out against them the Cavalry, up they were with their Enligns in all halt, and got them away with all speed possibly they could. The morrow after, when over and befides all other calamities, they were in danger of extream famine, and that Maharbat (who with all his power of Horse pursued them by night, and overtook them) had given his faithful word and promise, that if they delivered up their armour, he would fuffer them to depart in their fingle garments, they yeelded themselves. Which promise Annibal faw performed as truly, as all Carthaginians use to do, and false Carthaginian as he was, he clapt them all into prison, and hung irons upon them. This is that noble and famous battel fought at the Lake Thrasymenus, and of those few overthrows that the Romans had, the most memorable of all others. 15000 Romans were there flain in fight: 10000 were scattered: and flying I through fundry parts of Tuscany, gat to Rome. 1500 of the enemies lost their lives in the field. But many more of both fides afterwards died of their wounds. Others there be that report much murder and flaughter on both fides. For mine own part (befides that, I love not to write vain untruths, nor any thing without good warrant, and yet the humour of writers for the most part is too much given that way) I have followed for mine Author Fabius especially, who lived about the time of this war. Annibal having enlarged without ransome as many of his prisoners as were Latins, and put the Romans in freight ward, culled out from among the heaps of his enemies that lay one upon another, the dead bodies of his own men, and commanded they should be buried: and having with great care and diligence made search also, for the dead corps of Flaminius to inter it, he could never find it.

At the first news in Rome of this overthrow, the people ran together in exceeding fear and trouble, into the common place of Assemblies. The Wives and Dames of the City, went up and down to and fro in the freets, and enquired of whomfoever they met, what inddain calamity this was, whereof the bruit went; and what was become of the army? And when as the multitude affembled thick(as it were) to a publick audience, turning to the Comitium and the Senat-House, and called upon the Magistrats: at length somewhat before the sun-fet, Marcus Pomponius the Pretor came forth and faid, A great battel hath been fought, and we have loft the field. And albeit they heard of him no more than this of certainty, yet they filled one anothers ears with rumors, and carried home with them these news, to wit, that the Consul was killed, and a great part of his army with him flain: that there were but a few left alive, and those either fled and scattered up I and down in Tulcany or elfe taken prisoners by the enemy. And look how many casualties & misfortunes follow the overthrow of an army, into io many cares and perplexities were the spirits and minds of all those plunged, who had any kinstolk that feered under Flaminius the Cof. all the whiles they were ignorant, what was the fortune of their friends. And no man knew for certain, what he was to hope for or to fear. The morrow and certain dayes following there flood at the gates a fort of people and those were women more than men, waiting to see their friends themtelves or those that could tell tidings of them- and ever as they met with any they would flock about them, and be very inquintive: neither could they be plucked away from them of their acquaintance and knowledge; before they had questioned everyparticular circumstance, from point to point in order. There might a man have feen an alphabet of faces, in those that departed from w the messengers, according as the tidings was joyful or woful: there might a man have seen a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houses, either rejoycing for their good hap, or comforting them for their misfortune and calamity. The women especially, as well in joy, as allo in forrow, were in their extremities. One above the rest (as it is reported) standing at the gare, upon the suddain fight of her for alive & safe, fell down dead at his very feet. Another, who had received an untrue report of her fons death, as the far mourning ar home within her house in great fortow of heart, to foon as ever the law him coming into the house, for exceeding, joy yeelded her half breath, and died. And for certain dayes the Pretors kept the Senators together in Councel, from the fun-rising to the setting, consulting under whose conduct, and with what forces they might beable to withfrand the pursance of these victorious Carthaginians, But N before they were throughly relolved of any determinat purpose and courseto be taken, suddainly there arrived other news of a fecond loss, namely, that 4000 horimen under the leading of C. Controuse the Propretor levitrom & Servitisethe Colume his Collegue, were inclosed by Annibal in Mustria. For thicher they had taken their way upon the news they heard of the battail at Thrafamenas. The bruce and rumor hereof hammered diversly in mens heads, Some, whose minds were possessed already with great of a greater calamity, shought the loss of that Cavalry but small, in comparison of the former defeat: Others effeemed that which happed, not according to the imporrance of the thing it felt but like as it falleth out in the natural body of man, that if it be crafte and weak every occasion, be it never to fmall and light, is more offentive puto it and looperfelt than a greater caute and object in a found and firongrounditurion even fourthen any crois or ad-O werfith happeth appeorhe politick body of a City of CW dileased (as it were) and fickly, we are not to measure & weigh the same by the greatness of the according to the feeble and decated efface thereof, able to endure and abide nonew matter, that may furcharge and grieve it, what focuer. And the reform the City of these rook her felt to the foveraign falve and approved remeds, which the had long defired, and yet not applied and need of late; namely, to the nomination of a Dictator, And because the Cambul himself was absent, by whom alone it was thought he

A might be named; and by reason that Isaly was so overspread and forlated with the Punick forces. there might no courier be well dispatched, nor letters safely sent unto him: and for that the people had not authority or themselves to create a Dictator, they therefore elected a Pro-dictator(a thing that was never feen and practiled before that day) namely, Q. Fabius Maximus, and for his General of the Cavalry, M. Minneius Rufus, These had commission from the Senat, to fortify the walls and Towers of the City, to plant and bellow guards thereon, where they thought meet, and to cut up and break down the bridges upon the great rivers; shewing hereby, that fince they were not able to keep and defend Italy, they were now to fight for house and home, and to guard the very City. Annibal in this mean time was come directly by the way of Umbria, as far as to Spoletum, And after he had grievously wasted and spoiled the territory, he assaid to give assault to that City; but

R from thence he had the repulse with the lois of many of his men. And gueffing by the strength of that one Colony (where he feed but badly in the attempt of it) how great and difficult the enterprife might be of affailing the City of Rome; he turned another way into the * Picene country, * Marca Antenot only abounding in plenty of all kind of corn and grain, but also affording rich spoil and pillage: which the hungry and needy fouldiers for aged and caried away as greedily, beyond all meafure. And therefor certain dayes he kept a flanding camp, and refreshed his souldiers, toiled as well with winter journies and boggy wayes as also in the late battel, which was more joyous and fortunate in the loole and parting, than light and easy in the conflict and fighting. After he had refled and reixeshed his souldiers sufficiently, who took more pleasure inbooties and prizes, than in ease and repose, he dislodged, and journied forward; wasting and spoiling first the * Pretutian * Abruggor.

Cn. Jerushin the other Coniul, having had some light skirmishes with the Gauls, and won from them one mean Town of small importance, after he was adventised once of the death of his Colleague and the defeat of the army, fearing even then what danger might betide the walls of his native country, lest peradventure he should be absent in the hazard of the main chance, put himfelf in his journey toward the City of Rome. Q. The facred beds were openly to be feen . one for Jupiter and Juno, another for Nettune and Minerva: a third for Mars and Venus: a fourth for Apillo and Diana: a fifth for Vulcan and Vefta: and a fixth for Mercury and Ceres. Then were the Temples vowed: unto Venus Erycina, Q. Pabius Max, the Diotator, vowed one Temple. For so it was delivered from out of the books of * The goddess destinies, that he should vow it, who had the soveraign rule in the City, and unto * Mens, Atilius of Understan- the Pretor vowed another. Thus when Church matters touching Religion were finished the Dictator propounded concerning war and the State: namely, with what Legions and how many the Senat thought good to withstand the victorious enemy. And a decree passed, that he should receive the army at the hands of Cn. Servilius the Cof. and enrol befides of the citizens and allies, as many horimen & footmen as he thought convenient and that he should do and order all things at his own discretion, for the good of the Common-weal. Fabius said, That he would adjoin unto the army of Servilim, two Legions more: which being levied by the General of the horsemen, he proclaimed that they should meet together upon a certain day at Tybur: and when he had published a proclamation, That who foever inhabited within any Towns or Callles unlenced should depart into places of fafety: and that all should remove out of the villages of that country through which Annibal was to go (but first to fet on fire their houses, and spoil their corn, that he might find nothing there when he came he went himself forward by the high way or causey Flaminia, to meet with the Conful and the army. And when he discovered them marching about Otriculum K by the river Tyberis, and faw the Conful with his horsemen coming forward to him, he sent a Sergeant, to give warning to the Conful, for to come without his Lictors to the Dictator, who obeyed his commandment. And as their meeting together, represented an exceeding great shew of the Dictatorship unto citizens and allies both, who by reason of discontinuance so long time, had welneer forgotten that government: behold, there came letters from the City importing news. that certain ships of burden transporting victuals from Hostia into Spain for the army there, were by the navy of the Carthaginians boorded and taken about the found or haven of Coffa. Whereupon immediatly the Conful was commanded to go to Hoftia, to take up all shipping at Rome or at Hoftia, to furnish them with faylers, and man them with fouldiers, and so to pursue the Armado of the enemies, and to keep the coafts of Italy. A mighty number of men was levied at Rome. The L. Libertins also, who had children, and wess of lawful age so serve, sware allegeance unto him, to be histrue fouldiers. Out of this army of civizens, as many as were under 35. years of age, were shipped; the rest were lest behind toguard the City. The Dictator having received the Consuls army at the hands of Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, went through the Sabins Country, and arived at Tyber, whither he had commanded the new fouldiers to repair at a day. From thence by cross wayes he returned into the high way or causey Latina, even to Preneste: from whence (having fearched diligently by his espials, all the wayes) heled forward toward the enemy, purpoling in no place to hazard the fortune of bastail, but upon necessity. The very first day that he encamped not far from Arps, within the fight of his enemies, there was no ho with Annibal, but without further delay, he came forth into the field in battail array, bad him battail, and offred w fight. But feeing his enemies quiet, and no stirring in the camp, he fell to taunting and reviling them: faying, That now at length yet, the martial hearts of the Romans were danned and tamed and feeing they refused fight, they confessed plainly, and granted themselves inserior unto him in valor, prowels, and glory: which faid, heretired into his camp. Howbeit, chafing and fretting secretly in his mind, for anger that he had to deal hereaster with a Captain, far unlike to Flaminist and Semprovius: and that the Romans now at last, being schooled and taught by their own harms, and to their great coft, had fought out and got a Captain to match Annibal; Wreightwayes he began to fear the wifedom of the Dictator, and not his force but having had as yet no tryal of his constant relolution, he fell to disquiet his mind, and to tempt him with often removing his own tents, and wasting the fields of his allies even under his noie: one while heseemed N to march away apace out of all fight, another while he would of a fuddainftay, and lie close in some by-place and corner, out of the way, to spie when he could take him in some plain and even ground. But Fabius led his army, and marched above on the higher grounds, a prety distance off from the enemy, to as neither he would let himgo clean and abandon him, nor yet encounter with him. He kept his fouldiers for the most part wishin the camp, save only when necessity otherwise constrained. For purveyance of forage and fewel, they went neither few in number, nor stragling afunder. The wards of Horsemen and those that were lightly armed, standing alwayes in order of battail, and ready prepared and furnished for inddain impressions and rumults, vecided both security to his own souldiers, and also danger to his enemies, as they ranged all abroad and for aged the Countrey. In this manner never was the main chance put to the venture all at once O offortune: and the small tryals of light (cuffling and skirmishes (begun in latery and security, by reason of the recourse of releve so neer) inured and heartned the souldiers, frighted with somet foils, and made them at length to diftruft less either their own valour, or fortune. But Annie bal was not more discontented and displeased, non more ready to crosse and thwart these so wholfome policies and counfels of his, as his own General of hot fmen, who wanted nothing elfe but soveraign command, to overturn headlong the Common-weal: a man in all his designA ments violent and hasty; and of tongue intemperate. And first secretly among some few, but afterwards openly in the hearing of all men, he termed Fabius, in stead of a stayed and sober man, slow and dull: in itead of wary and heedful, timorous and fearful: attributing unto venues the names of vices of neer femblance: and having a fingular dexterity to debase his betters and superiours, exalted himself thereby: a cunning cast, of all others the worst, and yet hath mightily prevailed and sped too well in many that have used it, Annibal from Arpi passeth into Samnium, wasteth the country of Besteventum, winneth the City Telefia, and flill provoketh (of fet purpose) the Roman Captain, if haply he could incense him by to many indignities and losses of his allies, and fo draw him to fight on even hand.

R Amongst a great number of Italian consederats and allies, whom Annibal had taken prisoners at Thrasymenus and dismissed, there were three Campane horsemen, whom Annibal even then had tolled on, and allured with gifts and fair promifes to win unto him the hearts of their country-men. These brought word unto him, that in case he would lead and bring his army into Campania, he should soon be Lord of Capua. And albeit the thing in it self seemed greater than the quality of the perions that counselled him thereto: and therefore stood in mammering, one while in good hope and affurance, another while in tear and diffrost: yet they periwaded him as last to remove out of Samnium into Campania. After he had admonished them very often, to fee that they made their word and promites good by deed, and commanded them with alto return unto him with some of their principal Citizens and Country-men, he sent them away, C Himself gave commandment to his guide, to conduct him into the territory of *Cassum: being *S.Germane. advised by those that were skilful and acquainted with the coasts of those parts, that if he could gain aforehand that pase and forest, he might exclude the Romans from coming to rescue and succour their consederats. But the ambiguity of the name, and the Carthaginian language far differing from the Latine, cauled the guide to mistake Cassinum for Casinum: and so missing of his intended journey, he came down, through the Alifane, Calatine, and Calene Countries. into the plain champian region of Stella, Where feeing all the coalls environed round about with Mountains and Rivers, he called the guide unto him, and demanded where he was: and when he answered, that he should that day lodge in Cassimum, then and not before, the error was found; and he knew that he was far out of his way, for that Casinum was distant in another n Countrey far off. And after he had bearen the guide with rods, and hanged him up by the head, for an example to terrifie all others, he fortified himself within camp, and sent out Maharbal with the Horsemen into the Falern Country, to fetch in booties. So they wasted and spoiled as far as the waters of Sinuessa. Much harm did these Numidians, but the flight and fright of the people was far greater. And yet notwithstanding that great fear, when all was on a light fire as it were, and nothing but war, the Roman allies continued fill firm in their faithful allegeance: and the reason was, because they were ruled under a just and moderar government, and neither refufed, northought much cobe subject unto their betress, the only bond of loyal fidelity. But so foon as he had pitched his camp by the River Valenruis, and that the most goodly and pleasant Valenrois Country of all Italy was on fire, and the Villages every where burned and smoked again; whiles

E Fabins led his power over the ridge of the Mountain Massieus, the sedicion was like to have broken out again, and certain Captains of the mutiny began to be enkindled afresh. For there had been great quietness, and all was still for some sew dayes; because seeing the army march fafter than their usual manner was, they supposed verily, that they made more speed and hastned, to fave Campania from being spoiled and wasted. But when they were come to the formost edge and point of the Mountain Massicas, and that the enemies were within fight, burning the dwelling Houses of the Coloners and inhabitants of Sinnessa, and likewise of the Falern Country, and all this while not one word of battail;" And are we come hither indeed, quoth Minutius, to behold only and to fee, and feed our eyes with looking on our allies, confumed and wasted "with fire and (word) and if we bash at nothing else, can we for shame abide to see the Calamity p" of these Citizens here, whom our fore-fathers planted in Sinue ff. as coloners there to inhabit, "to the end that all this tract and coast should be safe from the invasion of the Samnits? The imoke of the villages and the fields now on fire, is ready to put out our eyes, and to choke us up: our ears refound and ring again with the pireous cries of our allies that e weepand lament, and cal oftner unto us than unto the Gods for help: And we here lead our army "as it they were a flock of sheep, over the shadowy forests, and hills out of the way, hid among " the clouds and thick woods to keep them from the heat of Sun. As Minutius spake these words in preaching wise; a number of Roman Colonels and Horsemencame flocking about him. Yea, and these lusty and rash speeches of his, came even unto the ears of the footmen: Soas, if it had lien in the voyces and election of the fouldiers; out of all question they feemed willing to prefer Minutius before their General Fatius, But Fabius again, regarding alwayes, with good eye his own men, no less than his enemies, carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever before of any other; albeit he was well ware, that not only within his own camp, but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing and flow proceedings: yet drew he out the rest of the summer, and held on stiffy the same course and purpose, & never altered his former manner: until that Annil al being clean disappointed of long defired battail, bethought himself anon and looked about for some places of winter abode considering, That L. the country where now he was, rather yeelded plenty for the present, than store for long continuance: as standing upon Hortyards and Vineyards, and all things planted rather for stuits of pleafure and delight, than for necessity and profit, Intelligence hereof being given to Falim, by hisespials, for that he knew well enough, that Annib. I was to return through the same streights, by which he had entered the Falern countrey; he holdeth and keepeth the hill Calicula, with fufficient garrifons and likewile Castlinum, a City divided by the river Vulturinus, and parteth the Falern and Campane countries afunder. Himfelf bringeth back his power through the fame hills, having fent out to discover and espie 400 Horsemen of confederats, under the conduct of L. Hostilius Mancinus, who being one of the crue of those lufty youths, that oftentimes heard the General of the Horsemen giving out abroad brave words and stout speeches, at first went forward in manner w of an espial, to discover and espie the enemy from a place of safety and security: and when as he law the Numidians ranging all about the villages, and slew some of them also whom he took at a vantage, fireight-wayes his mind wholly possessed and set upon fight; and so forgat the charge and direction of the Dictator, who had commanded him to go forward as warily and as closely as he possibly could, and to retire himself again before he came within fight of the enemies. The Numidians charging and recharging him afront one while, and flying from him another while drew him almost unto their very camp when as both horse and man were outweated. From whence Carrale, who then had the conduct and command of the Cavalry, fet out against him lustily upon the ipur and before they came within dare-short put the enemies to flight, and followed them continually in these almost five miles. Mancinus seeing neither the enemy to give overpursuse nor any N hope to estare away exhorted his men, and turned head upon them, overmatched as he wasevery way: where he himself and his choicest Horsemen were beset round and slain: the other taking themselves again to sie for life, first cameto Cales, and after through by-lanes and difficult wayes, to the Dictitor. That day, as hap was, Minutius had joyned himfeli to Fabius having been afore fent to keep with a strong guard, the forrest or pase, which above Tarracina, groweth irto a parrow guller, and reacheth to the fea; for fear left if the advenue of the way Appia, were without defence, A. n. b. I might enter and invade the country of Rome. When the Dictator and the General of Horsemen had joyned their forces together, they encamped upon the very high way, that Annibal was to passe with his army. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrowalter, the Carthaginians took up with their army all the way between the one camp and the other. O When as the Romans were quarted even under their very trench and rampier, in a place no doubt of great advantage, yet for all that approached Annibal with his light Horsemen : and to provoke his enemies, fought by starts and fits, charging upon them, and retiring back again with great nimblenesse. The Romans kept fill their standing, embettailed as they were. The fight was cold and lingering to the mind and liking of the Dictator, rather than of Annibal: and where there were of the Romans part 200 flain, there dyed 800 of the enemies. Then feemed Annibal * castellizzo. after, to be enclosed and shut up as it were and besieged within * Castlinum, seeing that Capua, Samnium.

A Samnium, and many rich and mighty Nations confederate with the Romans, were on their backs to furnish them with store of victuals. And Annibal contrary-wife was like to take up his wintering place, within the crags and rocks of Formit, amid the Sands of Linternam, and the mostly standing pools. Well wift Annibal now that he was laid unto hardly, by the same cunning fleights, that he had used himself. And therefore when as he could not eleape away by Casilman, and seeing that he must needs to the Mountains, and passe over the top of Callionia: for fear lest that the Romans should set upon his army enclosed in the vallies between the Mountains, he devited a stratagem, by way of a ridiculous flufion, to beguit the eye-fight of his enemies, and to fruitrate and deceive them of their expectation; by means whereof, he purposed in the beginning of the night. B closely and by flealth to gain the Mountains. The manner of his crafty device was this. He caufed to be gathered out of all the villages thereby many fire-brands ; then took he certain bayins or small fagots of bruth-wood, dry flicks, and such like traft, and tyed them fail to the horns of the Oxen, whereof he had tame and wild, a great number that he drave before him amongst other prizes gotten out of the country: fo as he might make wel-neer two thouland head. To Afdrubal he gave in charge, that fo foon as it grew to be dark night, he should drive those Oxen with their horns fer a fire toward the Mountains, and especially if he possible could, to the very streights and gullet which the enemy kept. It began no sooner to be dark, but Annibas with great filence diflodged and removed his camp, and the Oxen aforeisid were driven a good way before the enfigns and the army. When they were come to the foot of the Mountains, and to the C ftreight passages, immediatly the signal or watch-word was given to fire the Oxes horns, and to chale them up against the Hill. The beafts, what with fear to tee a light fire plazing over their heads, and what with pain to feel the heat now come to the quick flesh and the roots of their horns, fell tunning up and down, as if they had been mad. By this their gadding thus all at once every way, all the coppiles and iprings thereabout were let on a light fire, and feemed as if the whole woods and hills had burnt withat: the thaking of their heads allo to and fro without flay. made the blaze greater, and gave thew and temblance of men running from one place to another. They who were appointed and fet to keep the passages of the streights, so soon as they saw certain fires upon the tops of the Hills, and over their heads, supposing themselves to be entrapped and enclosed with fire on every fide, abandoned their hold, and kept their standing no longer; D and whereas the flame shone most out, thinking that to be the fatest way, they sped them this ther, even to the top and ridge of the Mountains. Then and there, they light upon certain of the Oxen wandring altray from their company, and at first seeing them a far off, but not well differning them , they imagined that they foit fire , and breathed there biszing flames out of their months; and wondering at the ftrange fight, ftood ftill amazed and aftonied. But when as afterwards they discovered the device, and found it out to be a labrile and deceirful invention, proceeding from mans brain, they miltruited withal some secret trains and am with, and with an exceeding noise fled away as fast as ever they could, and stumbled upon the vancurriers of their enemies, that were lightly armed. But they were affraid as well of the one lide as the other, to begin any skirmith in the night featon, and flayed until day light. In the mean while, Annibal E having conducted his whole army through the streights, and killed some of his enemies in the very pale, encamped himself in the territory of Alifas. Fabine delerged this tumult well enough, but doubting tome privy ambush, and abhorring urterly all night battails, kept his men within the strength of their rampiets. At the break of day there began a skirmish on the fide of the hills in which the Romans as being far more in number, had environed on every fide the light-armed fouldiers of the enemies, and foon deteated them, but that's band of Spaniards, fent back of purpole from Annibal, came to refcue them : who being better acquainted with the Mountains, and more light and nimble in running among the croggs and cliffs, by reason of well of the agility of body, as the fashion of their light harnesse; casily in that kind of skirmish. avoided and thirted from their enemy, heavily armed at all pieces, and used to fight upon the polain, and to fland firmly and keep their ground. Whereupon in the end they parted afunder one from the other, but nothing neer on even hand i for the Spaniards in a manner all, wene cleer away unburt, the Romans loft fome of their men; and to on both parts they returned to their camps. Pabine likewile removed, and having haffed over the ftreights of the forest. encamped in an high ground, and ftrongly fituate even over Alifu. Then Annibal making as though he would march through Samminm toward Rome, returned back, walting and spoiling the country as far as to the Peligni. And Fabius hovered ftill upon the Hill tops between the my of his enemies and the City of Rome; leading his holt fo, as neither he departed far, nor yet encountred and agrouted his enemy. Then Annibal turned his way, and departed from the Peligni, and retired himfelf into Applia, until he was come as far as Gerion, a City Cabandoned and forlorn of the inhabitants, by reason that a part of their wall was fallen downdecayed and rained. The Dictator fortified his camp in the territory of Larisson. Now was he tent for home from thence to Rome, by occasion of certain folemn facrifices : whereupon. be conferred and deale with the General of the Cavalry, not only by way of ablolute commandment, but also with advice and perswafions, year, and as one would say, by prayer and intreaty." "That he would truft more upon confiderate counsel, than doubtful fortune, and be directed "and guided rather by him , than follow the steps of Semprenius and Flaminism ; and not "think there was nothing done and effected, and make no reckning of this, That the enemy had

se been dallied withal, and trifled out, mocked and daluded atmost all the summer long. Why even M "Physicisus (quoth be) many times do more good to the lick body of the patient x by giving reft "and repole, than by firring and disquissing the humons therein. And no small matter usit, that "we are vanquified and overcome no more; at an chemics hands lie often used to wickery. And er after continual foils and overthrows, to have had reftly and a time of breathing. Having in this wife admonished the General of Horse aforehand (but all in vain) he took his way to Rame, In the beginning of this fummer, wherein thele exploits were performed , war began also in Spain both by Sea and Land. Afdrabal to that number of thips which he had received ready rigged and well appointed of his brother, joyned other ten. To Hamilton he gave the charge of a fleet offerty fail: and fo, looling from Carthage, whiles his thips kept neer to Land, he conducted his I army along the River upon the ftrand, ready to give battail to the enemy, howleever he should hap to encounter him either by Land or Sea , Ca. Scipio after he had intelligence that the enemy was removed out of his wintering harbour, at the first had likewise the fame intention and purpole, but afterwards doubting to encounter by Land, upon the exceeding great report that went of new aids, he embarked his belt and most choice souldiers, and with a fleet of 35 fail, fer forward to meet the enemy. And the fecond day after that he had looked from Taracene, he came to the rode diffant ten miles from the mouth of the River Iberus. From whence, two Pinnaces of the Maffilians were fent out afore, and brought word, that the Carabaginian Armado rode in the month of the River, and that the tents were pitched upon the bank. And therefore to the end that he might furprise them at unwares, and unlooking for them, with all the feating terrour at $ once, that he could possibly, he weighed anchor, and let fail toward the enemy. In Spain there are many Towrs standing upon high grounds, which serve the inhabitants of the country in good flead, both as watch-Towers to discover, and also as iconces to withit and Theeves and Rovers. From whence the enemies ships were descryed first, and a signal given to Afdrubal in such fort, as the tumult and trouble arose upon the Land, and in the camp, before any was seen on the Sca and amongst the ships a for as yet neither noise of oars, nor any ordinary stir elic of mariners, was heard; nor yet the capes and promontories between suffered the fleet to be feen. But then, all on a suddain, certain Horsemen sent from Afdrabal one after another, commanded the fouldiers (who either wandred along the strand, or fate quiet within their pavilions ; looking for nothing leffe than fight that day) prefently in all hafte to go aboore, and to arme, for that the Ro- I man fleet was not far from the haven. This commandment the Horfemen that were lent, gave every where. And within a while Afdrabal came in person with the whole army. All was on a burry, and full of findry starms ; whiles both mariners and fouldiers, made natt to be shipped, rather like men that fled from Land, than went to fight. Scarce were they all embarked, when fome of them loofed from the shoar, and plucked up Anchors, others out the Anchor Cables. for that nothing should tray them: and all that they did, was with such hafte, that whiles the fouldiers were occupied in making themselves ready to fight; the mariners were hindred in their bufines: and whiles the mariners made speed, the fouldiers were kept from taking their armour, and fitting themselves therewith. By which time Scipio was not only approaches neer, but also had marshalled and ordered his ships ready to fight, So as the Carthaginians were trong bled as well with the burly burly and tumult of their own people, as with the affanit and battel of their enemies. And having (to fay a truth) made an affay and proffer of fight; rather than begun any indeed, they turned a way their fleet, and fled. And feeing, when they were once put to flight (by reason they were parted asunder all abroad, and lay open to so many of their com mies, tollowing them upon the poop all at once) that they were ready and easy to be bouged and pierced, they rowed on all hands to the fhore. Some were fain to wade to Land, others leave to drye ground ; one fort armed, another fort unarmed ; and to efcaped to their company, embattails ed along the strand. Howbeit, in the very first encounter and onlet, two Carthagician shape were taken, and four funk. The Romans, albeit they law the enemies, makers of the land, and might behold them it and in battail array all along the River fide upon the banks, yet made they no N fray, but chaied the fearful fleet of their enemies : and fo as many thips; as either had not cracked iplicted; and broken their ttems, with dafning upon the flore, or were not run aground; and fluck faft by their keels in the shelves, those they drew up, and warped that the deep; with ropes faltned to their poops; and lo of thirty they took five and twenty. And yet, the taking of thele veffels was not the belt and goodlieft work of their victory: but this paffed all, that with one light skirmish they became L L. of all the Sea along those coasts. And therefore arriving with Visa loyofs, their whole navy before " Honofea, they landed their men, won the City by forcible affault, lacke it, and from thence went forward toward Carehage. And after they had toraged and wated all the territory about, at the last, they fired the very houses that Joyned to the walls and gares of the * Guardaman, City. From thence the Armada laden now and charged with rich pillage, failed as far as * Longuar 9 or the cape of sica. Where they found great store of Spare [to make Cables] provided and laid up there by drabal to ferve the navy : and when they had taken thereof almuch as they needed, they made light fire of all the reft. Neither coulted the Roman fleer slong the continent and main only and " roles, or I- fourted those parts which lay out into the Sea, but pasted also unto the Rie Ebajas : where they affanked bothy for two dayes force, the head City of the Hard, with much ado, and had effect. And when they perceived, that they pent time in vain, and were patt all hope to wo it, they fell to rob and spoil the country? and after they that rifled and burned certain villages.

A and got a greater booty & pillage than they had out of the main, they retired themselves to their thips: and thither came Embassadors from the Islands Baleares unto Scipios craving peace. From thence he came back with the fleet, and returned into the hither part of the Province, whither reforted unto him the Embassadors of all the Nations that inhabit about Iberus, yea, and of many alfo, from the farthett part of all Spain. But of States, that abiolutely came under the obedience of the people of Rome, doing fealty and homage unto them, and giving holtages for affurance of their allegeance, there were above 120, Scipio therefore, taking himself strong enough in land forces, went on as far as to the chaie of " Cafinlo, And Afdrutal retired himself into " Luftiania, near " colling la the Oceaniea, Hereupon the rest of the summer was like to be quiet: and quiet had it been, for vela n any thing that the Carthaginians did to the contrary, But, (over and besides the natural dipositi- Portugal, on of all Spaniards unconstant, busie, and evermore desirous of novelties and alterations. Mardonius a Nobleman, who before time had been the Lord and Prince of the Hergetes, feeing the

Romans retired backfrom the forrest, toward the sea-coast, stirred up the the people of his countrey, and invaded the peaceable Territories of the Romans affociates, for to spoil and waste the fame, Against whom there were sent from Scipio three thousand Romans, besides certain auxiliary fouldiers also, lightly armed; who in a light skirmish discomfited his forces, (as being a power gathered in halte, and disordered flew many, took some prisoners, and disarmed the greater part of them. Nevertheless, the rumour of this alarm caused Astrabal, as he departed to the Ocean, to crois the river Iberus back again, for the refeue and defence of his friends and Allies, The Carmada, when inddennews diverted the war another way. The Princes of the Celtiberians, who had sent the Embassadors of their country, and hostages unto the Romans, upon a messenger dispatched unto them from Scipio, arole up in arms, and entred the Province of the Carthaginians with a firong and puissant army, won three towns by affault; and afterwards, in two battels

c thaginians were encamped in the territory of the Ilercaonians, and the Romans near the new Ar-

which they fought with Afdrubal right valiantly flew 15000 enemies, and took 4000 prisoners, and many military entigns they bare away. Whiles Spun flood in these terms, P. Scipio came as L. Deputy into that Province, continuing still his government after his Consulfhip expired, and was lent from the Senat with thirty ships of war, eight thousand souldiers, and great store of victuals. This great sleet, in regard of D many hulks and thips of burden which accompanied it, was kenned and discovered afar off, to the great joy both of Romans, and alfo of their friends and affociats, and arrived within the port and haven of Tarracon. Where the foundiers were disbarked, and Scipio joyned with his brother: and from that time forward they agreed together, and with one accord managed the war. And whiles the Carthaginians were amuted with the Celtiberian war they made no stay, but paffed over Iberus, & leeing no enemy they marched on toward Sagantum; for that the bruit went, that the hostages of all Spain, delivered unto the custody of Annibal, were kept there in hold within the Castle, but with a small guard about them. That was the only pledge which staid all the Cities of Spaine, wholeminds were well affected and enclined to entertain league and lociety with the Romans, but they feared lest if they should revolt, it would cost the lives of their E children. This bond which held Spain in awe, one man eased them of, by means of a device and practife more witty and subtile than honest and loyal. There was at Saguntum, one Acedux a Nobleman of Spain, trusty and faithful aforetime unto the Carthaginians : but then (as the nature is for the most part of these Barbarians) as fortune altered her countenance, so changed he his allegeance. And supposing, that if he should flie unto the enemies, without performing some notable treason, and delivering into their hands one thing or other of great importance, he should be counted no better than a vile; base, and infamous creature, he cast about how he might wind himfelf into these new Allies, and win them by some good service, unto their best and greatest behoof. And confidering all the means that Fortune might bring within his compais to effect; he employed himself especially at the length, to let free and deliver those hostages; thinking that It the only way to win and procure unto the Romans the amity of all the Princes and great men of Spain. But knowing assuredly, that without warrant from Boft ar the Constable of the Castle, the keepers of those hostages would do nothing, he setteth in hand and cunningly goeth to work with Boft ar himself. Now lay Boft ar in Camp without the City by the water fide, to impeach the Romans for entring the haven. Thither came Acedux to him, withdrew him apart into a secret place, and declared unto him as a man ignorant, in what state things stood. Namely, "That it was fear and nothing elfe, that kept the Spaniards unto that day in obedience, because "the Romans were so far off: but now the Romans were encamped on this side therus, as a sure "fortrels and place of refuge unto them if they minded any innovation and change of State: and therefore seeing they could not long be kept by feir, they were to be obliged and bound G" unto Annibal by some favour and good turn. When Bostar marvelled and demanded, what sudden demerit this might be, and of io great consequence. "Mary (quoth he) send back "the holtages into their own Cities. "Gervice and employment: and the thing which of it felf in nature is acceptable. I will in what I H " can grace and commend the same, and make it more meritorious. Having thus perswaded the man being not altogether to wily as other Carthaginians naturally are, he went by night lecretly as far as the Corps de guard of the enemies, and after he had met and talked with some Spaniards that were auxiliary fouldiers in the Camp and by them was brought before Scipio he declared up. to him his whole intent and defignment, and the canfe of his coming. And after they had given and received faithful promise mutually between them, and agreed of time and place for the delivery of the hostages unto Scipio, he returned again to Sagumum. The day following he spent with Boft ar, in receiving Commission from him, for the execution of this matter. And thus being dismissed and having his dispatch, he purposed to go in the night, to the end that he might (for. I footh) avoid the watch and wards of the enemies, the Romans: and at the hour appointed he raifed those who had the guard and custody of the children, and put himself on his way; and simple man he) as if he had been altogether ignorant of that which hapned, brought them within the compass of an Ambushment, forelaid beforehand by his own wily and crafty device: and so were they brought into the Roman Camp. All other points bendes, concerning the rendring of the hoftages, according to the agreement and appointment with Boftar, were performed in the fame order as they should have passed, in case all had been done in the name of the Carthaginians, and to their behoof. But the Romans won much more thank, and gained greater favour thereby, than the Carthaginians could have attained in the like curtefie. For the Carthaginians whom in their properous success the Spaniards had found by experience to be rigorous unto E them and proud) might have been supposed if they had done it now, to have been mollified and made more benign and gravious through adverse fortune and fear: but Scipo the Roman General at his first coming, and unknown before time, began with a notable example and testimony of clemency and liberality. And Acedian befides reputed a wife and prudent man feemed not without great reason to have made exchange of his Allies and Friends. Whereupon they all defired with one accord to revolt and prefently they had taken arms indeed and rebelled, but for the approach of winter which forced as well Romans as Carthaginians to betake themselves to their winter harbors.

These were the occurrents that fell out also in Spain, in the second summer of the Punick war: whiles in Italy the wife and wary delaies the industrious temporizing of Fabius in the manner of L his warfare gave the Romans tome respit and intermission of their foils and overthrows. Which as it wrought in Annibal no small trouble of mind and perplexity, to see that the Romans at the last had hoten for their General a man who managed war by discourse and guidance of found reason & not by adventure or fickle fortune; so it was despised of his own Citizens, as wel those that were armed abroad, as gowned at home: & namely when during the abience of the Dictator, there hapned to be a field fought through the rashness of the Generall of the Cavalry, with more joyfull fuccess to speak truly than happy and fortunate. Two other things there were befides, that caused the Dictator to be worse thought of, and in great disgrace and obloquy. The one through the desentful and wily policy of Annibal: who being enformed by certain fugitive Traitors (that fled from Rome unto him) which were the lands and possessions of the Dicta-M tor; gave express commandment when he had destroyed the country about, and made all even with the ground, to forbear all kind of hostility there only, and to touch nothing of his, either by fire or iword : to the end it might be thought there had been some packing between him and Annital; and that this was the hire and onfideration agreed upon between them two. The other arose from an action of his own: namely, about the exchange and coursing of certain prisoners or captives: which peradventure at the first appearance might have seemed doubtful and sufpicious (because therein he staid not for to have the Commission and approbation of the Senat) but in the end and up shot it turned no doubt, to his singular praise and commendation. In that enterchange abovefaid it was capitulate between both Generals, of Romans and Carthaginians, (like as it had been afore in the first Punick war) That whether side received more Captives N than they gave again, should yield for every one souldier * two pound and a half of silver. When it fell out therefore that the Roman Dictator Fabius; had received more prioners by 247 than Annibel, and the paiment of the filver for them due; after much debate in the Senat house, (because he had not direction therein from the LL.) was delaied, and no order taken therefore; he Roman denafent his fon to Rome of purpose, to make sale of his lands, which had not been eudammaged by Annibal: and so to his own cost, and out of his private purse dis harged a publike debt.

Annibal now lay in leaguer before the walls of Gerion, a City which he had won and fet on fire, and referved a few houses standing, to serve him instead of barns and garners for his grain. From thence he fent out two third parts of hisforces to purvey corn: and remained himself in guard with one third part, ready in arms, (but lightly appointed and without any bag and bag-O gage) in a meet and convenient place; both for defence of the Camp, and also for discovery of all the oasts about that no assault were made upon the purveyors. The Roman Army lay then in the Territory of Larinum, and the Captain General was Minntins Commander of the horiemen, because the Dictator (as is abovesaid) was gone to the City of Rome. But whereas these had usually encamped before, upon some high hill and strong place of security; now they began to draw down into the vale and the plain ground, and to devile crafty means and fraragems beyond the natural reach of the Commander himself; namely, how they might affail

A either the purveyors as they stragled about in the country, or set upon the Camp of their enemies. left with a small power and guard to defend it. Annibal was not ignorant, that together with the General, the whole manner and conduct of their warfare was changed; and that the enemy would fight rather more rashly and hastily, than wisely and warily. And himself (who would have thought it, confidering the enemy was approached nearer) fent out a third part only of his fouldiets to provide corn and forrage, and kept the other twain with him in the Camp: he removed also his tents nearer to the Romans, almost two miles off from Gerion, to a little hill within the fight of the enemies, to the end they might know he was minded and ready to refere and defend the purveyors, if haply they should be charged upon. Then espied Annil al another hill nearer, and B standing even over the very Camp of the Romans. For the gaining whereof, (seeing that if he should have gone by day time openly, he had been no doubt prevented by the encinies, who would have leized it first, by reason it was nearer unto them)he sent certain Numidians by night, who surprised it and kept it. But the Romans making little or no account of their small number, drave them the morrow after from thence, and thither removed their own tents: 10 as then, there was but a little distance between one Camp and the other, and the same, in a manner wholly takenup and replenished with Romans and withall, at the same time, the horiemen of the Romans with certain footmen lightly armed were fent out at a postern gate of the Camp (which opened not upon the Carthaginians) against the forragers, whom they discomfited, put to slight, and flew a great number of them. Neither durst Annibal issue forth to skirmish i for, having fo r few about him, he was hardly able to defend his Camp, in case it had been assaulted. So he was driven now to use the policy and shifts of Fabius, (for part of his forces were away) and managed his war, fitting fill as it were, and keeping the enemy at a bay and at flaves end: and so retired with his fouldiers to the former Camp, under the walls of Gerian. Some write, that there was a field pitched, and a fet battel fought with banners displaied, wherein Annibal at the first encounter was discomfited and chased to his Camp: but from thence they issued forth who were within and so the sear turned upon the Romans, who on a sudden were put to the worst that by the coming of Numerius Decimus (a Samnit) with fuccour, the fight was reenforced and renewed. This man, not only nobly descended, but also of great power and wealth, as well in Bovianum his native Country, where he was born, as throughout all Samnium (by order and commandment from the Dictator) came with a power of 8000 toot, and 200 horsestoward the Camp; and being espied by Annibal on the backfide, gave both parties good hope of fresh and new aid. But when the voice went, that Fabius at the same time was coming also from Rome, Annibal for fear of being entripped within tome Ambush, retired back with his own men, and the Romans made pursuit after him; and with the help of Numerius the Samnit, won in one day by force two fortrefles, So there were 6000 enemies slain, and 5000 Romans. And yet as equal in a manner as the lois was of both parts, the rumour ran to Rome of a brave victory, with letters allo in post from the General of horlemen full of folly and vanity. Much arguing there was and debate about these matters both in Senate, and before the people fundry times. And when all the City besides was joyous, and the Dictator (alone) gave no credit either to the bruit that was blazed, or the letters; faying withall, E That if all were true, yet he feared more the fawning than frowning of fortune: then M. Mache lus a Tribune of the Commons stepped forth and faid, "That this above all was not to be fuffe. The speech of "red: that the Dictator, not only while he lay in Camp, opposed himself against all goodness, and Merellu a-

"frained all valorous fervices but also being absent from thence, crossed and disgraced that which gainst Fabius, " was well done and worthily atchieved; and that he, of purpole, drew the war in length and pro-"longed the time to the end he might continue the longer in government, and be the man alone " to command all, both in the City and abroad in the Army : for one of the Confuls was flain in "battel, the other under a pretence & colour of puriuing the Carthaginian fleet, was sent out of the "way, ar enough off from Italy: as for the two Przetors, they were employed both in Sicily and " Sardinia: and yet neither of those two Provinces had any need of a L. Deputy there. And M. F " Minutius Generall of the horsemen, was kept prisoner as it were, and might neither see enemy, "nor do any martial exploit, And hereupon it is (quoth he) that not only Sammium (whereof the " possession was surrended unto the Carthaginians, as if it were a territory lying beyond [berus] "but the Campane, Galene, and Falern territories were utterly overrun and wasted, whiles the "Dictator abode fill at Cafilinum, and with the legions of the people of Ram defended his own "lands & polleffions only. And when the Army and General of the Cavalry, were defirous of bat-"tel they were kept back enclosed in a manner within the compass of the Camp & their weapons "taken from them, as if they had been captive enemies : Se at length when the Distator was once "departed from them, they iffued forth of the Camp, like men delivered from fiege, & so diffrom, fried & put to flight their enemies. In confideration of all these things, (he said) if the Commons

G " of Rome were of that courage, as sometimes they had been he would boldly have put up a bilifor "to deprive C. Fabias of his government. But now for this time, he would propound a more in-different & reasonable law, by verme whereof the Compander of horsemen may be made equal. and extolled the valour of the enemys or rehearled & reckoned up the loffes and foils received for H two years space through the rashness and unskilfulness of the Commanders and faid withall that the General of the horsemen was to answer and give account for fighting against his edict and express commandment." Moreover (quoth he) if I were in place of soveraign rule and government. " & to do all according as I thought good, I would effect and bring to pais, within few daies, that "men should know that a good warrior was to make small reckning of fortune but wisdom, wit. 44 and counsel were to guid and direct all, And for mine own part, I deem it a great honor & glory "to have preferred an army in a time of trouble and danger from shame and ignominy, than to " have flain many thoulands of enemies. After he had made thele and tuch like freeches & reasons in vain and created for Col. M. Attilius Regulus: for that he would not be present to debate the I question concerning the right and authority of his own government, he departed by night season toward the army; even the very day before that the forefaid law in build be propounded. The morning came and the commons were affembled to an audience: wherein men feemed rather fecreely in their hearts to malice the Dictator, & to affect and favour the General of the horlemen. than durft come forth and be seen to persuade and set forward that which pleased them all in common, And not withstanding the bil was exceedingly well liked of yet there wanted one to give fome credit and authority thereunto. At length, one stepped forth to set it onfoot, namely, C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prator, a man not only of obscure degree by calling, but also of vile & base parentage descended. His father was (as they say) a Butcher, who kept shop and fold meat himfelf, and trained up his fon as his apprentice in the fame mechanical and fervile # occupation. This Varro being a young man, and well left by his father (who was grown rich, and gained greatly by his trade) gave his mind and conceived some hope to live more gentlemanlike: and took a great liking to the common place, and pleading at the bar: exercifing himself in entertaining causes of base persons, against the estate and name of honest Citizens and of good reputation: by means whereof he grew to be known among the people, and afterwards was advanced to place of worship and honour. And having been Treasurer of the City, and born both Ædileships, as well that of the Chair, as the other of the Commons: and at ength gone through one Pratorship he aspired now higher, inhope to be Consul and full craftily waited his time, and sought to wind himself within the favor of the people, by means of the ill opinion and hard conceit they had of the Dictator: & thus he alone went away with all the affectionate love of the Commons. L All men that were either at Rome, or in the Army, both good and bad, in general (excepting the Dictator himself received and admitted that bill as made to his diferace and shameful reproach. But he with the very fame gravity and conflancy of heart, endured these injurious course & dealing of the people raging against him, wherewith he had born his advertaries slandering & charging him before the multitude: and having received in the way as he fournied letters importing the decree of the Senar for dividing his authority equally with the General of the horiemen, and being affired that not withflanding his commission were parted and communicated with another, vet his skill and sufficiency of conduct and command, remained skill with himself with a mind invincible as well against Citizens as enemies, he returned to the army. But Minutal, who before that time was hardly to be endured, both for his fortunate success, and also for the favour of the M common fortinow verily beyond all measure and bounds of modelty, vaunted and gloried in that had conquered & got the maftery over Fabius as well as over Annibal. That Fabius I say who "in time of diffress and calamity, was the only warrior and Captain that could be found out to march Annibal: that the superior Magistrate was by the consent & approbation of the people, (a thing never to be found in any record of Chronicles) made but even equal with the inferi-"or; to wit the Dictator with the General of horsemen; and in that City, wherein the Comman-"ders of the Cavalry were wont to quake and tremble at the rods and axes of the Dictator. So conspicuous and evident in theeies of the world, was his felicity and prowess above all others. And therefore minded was he tofollow his own fortune, and to take his time: in case the Dicta-"tor fill continued lingting in floth and idleness, condemned in the judgment both of God and N et man. Wherupon, the very first day that he & Fabius were met together, he faid that they were above all things to determine & fee down in what fort they might order this their equal authority of government. He for his part thought it best, that each other day or if longer time between were supposed better) they should one after the other afternatively have the full and whole command of all for the time in their feveral turns: that if any occasion of fighting a barrel were preferted, they might be able to countervail the enemy, not only in countel, but also in power and frength. Q. Fabing liked not of this; supposing that what soever lay in the hands and disposition of his rash collegue must needs be subject unto the arbitrement of Fortune: Saying moreover unto him," That he was indeed to impart unto him government and rule, but not wholly to depart "therefro, and thirt himself out." And therefore he would never willingly fail, but (to his power) 0
"manage by counsel and discretion offerare or other: neither would be divide with him either " time or daies, but the forces and armies : that Mojatias might have one moyty, and himself anoes theres fince he might not prefervealt by his own counsel & policy, yet he would endeavour (10 far as he could to fave somewhat. And so much he prevailed that they parted the Legions between them, as the manner of the Confuls was. The first and fourth fell to Minutens, the lecond and third to Fabius. In like manner they divided the horfemen number for number, and the auxiliary fouldiers of Allies and Latines. The Generall of the horsemen would needs likewise that they should be encamped a under.

Annibal conceived hereupon a two-fold joy, (for hewas not ignorant of all that was done among the enemies, partly by intelligence given him from thence by fugitives, and partly by means of his own efcouts and ipies) for he made this reckoning, both that he should deal wellenough with the lavish rashness of Minutius, and handle him in his kind; and also that the prudent policy of Fabius was abridged and diminished by the one half. Now there was a little hill between the Camp of Minutus and the Carthaginians: and no doubt there was, but that he who could gain it aforehand should have the vantage of the enemy, in regard of the ground. That hill Annibal was not fo defirous toget without skirmith, (& yet it had been a matter of good importance) as willing thereby to give some occasion of fighting and scuffing with Minutius, whom B he wist very well to be alwaies forward enough to encounter him and make resistance. The plain all between, seemed at the first fight nothing commodious nor good for men that would lay an ambushment, because it was neither over-grown with any woods, nor yet in any part roughly over-pread and covered, fo much as with briers and brambles. But in very deed, the ground was naturally made for to cover and hide an Ambuscado: and the rather, because in so naked and bare a valley, none would have imagined and suspected any deceirs trains, and for elaying of wait. And yet there were in divers nooks and corners thereof certain hollow rocks and caves, and fome of them of sufficient capacity to receive 200 armed men. In the clurking holes there were beflowed 5000 of horsemen and footmen one with another, some in one place, some in another, according as they might commodiously lie there closely hidden. And yet, lest that the stirring of C any one that might chance to go forth unadvifedly, or the glittering of armour, should be wray the trains in so open a valley, Annibal by sending our at the break of day some sew for to seize the aforefaid hill, withdrew the eyes of his enemies anotherway. These at the first view were deipised of the Romans for their small number, and every man was desirous to be doing with them, and their fingers itched for to let the enemies back, and drive them from thence. The General himself Minutius, assool-hardy and forward as he that was most, sounded the alarm, and commanded to go to the winning of the place, braving and threatning of the enemies full vainly. First, he sent forth his light armed mento skirmish, but afterwards, the Cornets of horsemen, set close and jointly together in array: and at the last, seeing the enemies seconded with new succours and supplies, he advanced forward himself with his Legions in order of battel. D And Annibal, wherefoever he perceived his men to be diffressed, made out continual fresh aides one after another, both of horse and foot, ever as the fight encreased and grew hotter: to as now he had his full army in field, and they maintained battel on both fides with all their power and main forces. First, the light armed Romans, notwithstanding the disadvantage of the ground, defirous to get up against the hill, (possessed aforehand of the enemy) were put back, and beaten down again: infomuch, as in their retire, they put the horlemen in fear that followed hard upon them, and fled for refuge to the Enfigus of the Infantry. The main battell of the Legionary footmen, among all the rest that were affrighted, only remained without sear, undaunted; and feemed in a plain, fer, and downright field without ambush, likely enough to have held their own, and in no respect to have been over-matched; so couragious they were, and had taken such E heart upon their fite victory, some few daies before. But the enemies starting suddenly out of their Ambuscadoes, so troubled, disordered, and terrified them, flanking them on both sides and charging withall behind, that neither their heart served any of them to fight, nor their hope remained to fly and escape away. Then Fabius hearing the first cry, and knowing thereby that they were in great fear, and feeing befides a far off their battell difordered and in difarray, "I thought even as much (quoth he) and no sooner than I seared, it is sallen out: Fortune I see well, hath "over-ranght fool-hardiness, and taken it tardy. The man, for footh, that must need s be made e-"quall with Fabius in government, feeth by this time, that Annibal is his good Mafter, & his beeter by ods in prowels and fortune: but we shall find out some other time to chide and to be anegry. Come on now, forth with your flandards and enfigns, let us wrest from our enemies hands F "the victory, and wring from our Citizens mouths confession of their errour and trespals. Now when some of them were slain, and others looked about which way to make escape and flie: FAbius with his forces shewed himself, as sent down from heaven to rescue them. And before he came to lance one javelin, or began to joyn battell and fight one stroke, he not only staid his fellows from running away, but also his enemies from surther heat of fight. As many of the Romans as were disbanded and scattered asunder all abroad, repaired again speedily from all parts, and rallied themselves to the entire battell: the rest who by whole troops had turned their backs, made head again upon the enemy: and one while giving ground and retiring by little and little, another while standing in a ring and round together stediast, kept this order by turns: so as now, both they that were discomfited, and those that were unfoiled became reduced into one body G of a battell, and advanced their enfigns against the enemy. By which time Annibal sounded the retreat, and openly confessed and said, that as he had vanquished Minutine, so he was soiled and overcome of Fabius. Thus when the more part of the day was spent with variable for sune, and all retired again to their Camps, Minutius called together his fouldiers, and pake unto them after this manner: "I have oftentimes heard it spoken (my good souldiers) that he is the best man "and most infficient, who knoweth himself what is best to do: next to him is he esteemed, that " will be ruled and directed by fage advice & counsel but he that neither hath the skill to advise an-"other nor the grace to be advited by another, is simply of the worst nature & good for nothing. ~

66 Since that we therefore are not so happy as to attain unto the highest degree of wit, and per-H of fection of nature, let us content our felves with the fecond place, and keep a mean between: "and whiles we learn to rule, let us fettle our selves and resolve to obey him that is wifer than "our selves. Let us joyn in Camp with Fabins, and when we have presented our selves and our "enfigns before his pavilion and tribunal, fee that when I falute him by the name of Father (as is befeeming his excellent majefly, and the benefit by us of him received) that ye also call those " fouldiers your Patrons, whole valiant hands and trufty arms erewhile protected you: that this "day may give us yet, if nothing elfe, the honour and name of thankful persons, Having thus said, he gave commandment to pack up bag and baggage, and to dislodge and as they marched in good array toward the Camp of the Dictator, they firmek both him and also all about him into a wonder and admiration, And having pitched their enfigns before the Tribunal: then Minstius the Ge-

His foeech to the Dictator. neral of the horse went forth before the rest: and after he had greeted Fabius himself as his Father. and the whole Army likewife faluted those about Fabius, by the name of Patrons: "To my pa-"rents (quoth he) O Dictator, unto whom I have made you equall in name only (as much as my congue will give me leave) I am bound and beholden for my own life only and no more: but to so you I am indebted for faving both my life, and all these here. The Act therefore and ordinance of the Commons which hath been a clog and burden to me rather than an honour, here of my "felf I renounce, revoke, and abolish : and (that which I pray God may prove to the good both of you and me, of mine army and yours, as well that which is preserved, as that which is the pre-"ferver) lo I submit and surrender again my self under your command and government, together K "with these ensigns and legions thereto belonging; beseeching you to pardon me, and to entertain me in the room of the General of the Cavalry, and those here with me, every man in his former place. Then interchangeably they gave their hands one to another: and the fouldiers (after the affembly dismissed) were curteously invited, and triendly entertained, as well by them that were unknown unto them as or their acquaintance, and so the day, dolorous, heavy, and almost dismall and accursed turned to be joyful and testival.

So foon as tidings came to Rome of these occurrents, and the same confirmed as well by the letters of the Generals themselves, as also by the common voice of souldiers from both Armies, every man, the best he could, praised and extolled Maximus up to the sky; whole honour and reputation was as great in the opinion of Annibal and the Carthaginians, for then and never before, L they found, that they had to deal and war in fialy, and with Romans. As for the two years space before, they fet so light both by Roman Captains and souldiers, that they could be hardly perswaded that they warred with that Nation, whereof there went to great a fame, and of whom their forefathers had reported such wonders and terrible things. They say also, that Annibal as hereturned out of the field, gave out these words, " That the cloud which setled on the hill tops, ho-"vered so long in the wind that it proved a tempestuous storm in the end.

Whiles these things were doing in Italy, Cn. Servilius Geminus the Conful, having failed about the coasts of Sardina and Corsica with his fleet, and received hostages both of the one Isle and the other passed over into Affrick: and before that he landed in the continent and firm land, he wasted the Island * Meninx, and having received * ten talents of filver of the inhabitants there-M about, for fear left their Territory also should be consumed with fire, and spoiled as well as the rest; he came to Affrick, and there set his forces ashore. From thence heled his souldiers and marriners likewise one with another disbanded and out of ordersas if they were to rob and spoil fome defart Islands, unpeopled and void of Inhabitants. Whereupon they fell unadvisedly into an ambush, and being unskilfull of the country, and therewith but few and scattered they were soon enclosed among many, and with much flaughter and shameful flight were driven and beaten back to their ships. The fleet thus having lost a thousand men, and one Treasures of the Army among them called Sempronius Blasus, loosed in great haste from the shore (which now was overspread by enemies) and held their course for Sicily, and at * Lilybaum was set over and delivered to T.Ottacilius the Prator, for to be brought back again to Rome, by P. Sura his Lieutenant. Cn. Servilius N himself journeyed through Sicily by land, and crossed the narrow seas into Italy: for both he and his Collegue M. Attilius were fent for by the letters of Fabius, to receive the Army at his hands, now that his fix-months-foveraign government was well near expired. All the Annals in a manner do record, that Fabius was the man, who during his Dictatorship, sought and waged war with Annibal. Calins writeth also, that he was created Dictator by the people. But both Calins and the rest, either knew not or else forgot, that the Consul Servilius, who then was far from Rome, and in the Province of France, had the lawful right and authority only to nominate a Dictator: and because the City so affrighted, by reason of that notable overthrow could not stay so long, they were driven to this shift, That there should be created by the people a Pro-Dictator or Di-Etator his Deputy. But the noble acts and glorious renown of that General, together with the O

ly this point, and caused the Pro-Dictator to be reputed Dictator and so called The Confuls, M. Attilius Regulus, and Cn. Servilius Geminus, having received the army (asis beforefaid) fortified in good time the places for wintering harbour (for it was then the Autumn feafon) conducted and mannaged the wars together in great concord, and followed the same polirick course that Fabius had done before them. For as Annibal made rodes at any time to purvey corn, they would meet him just at every turn, in sundry places, and either cut off the tail of his title of his Image, which might recommend his housemore honourable to posterity, gained east-

A men, or intercept and catch them as they went scattering, but never hazard all in one set field the only thing that the enemy that at, by all the means he could device. And to near driven was Annibal, and to those terms of want and scarcity, that but for very shame (left by his dislodeing and departure he might he thought to flie) he would have retired back into Gallia, as being out of all hope to maintain and fuftain his Army with victuals in those parts, in case the new Confuls who next succeeded, should hold on still the same policy and manner of warfare. Winter now approached, and all the war that was continued and refted about * Gerion: at what time * circonsta. there arrived at Rome Embassadours from Naples, who brought with them, and presented into The Embassathe Council-House, forty massie boles of beaten gold: and withall delivered this speech, and faid, dors of Naples B"That they knew full well, how the Treasure of the people of Rome was wasted and confirmed "by long wars. And for almuch as the faid wars were maintained, as well for the defence of the

"Cities and Lands of allies, as for Rome, the very head, mother City, and principall Citadel (as it "were lof all Italy, and for the loveraign dominion and Empire thereof the Neapolitans thought "it meet and reason, that what store of gold their ancestors had left unto them, were it for to a-"dorn and deck themselves, or to relieve them in time of need and necessity, with it they were "to aid and help the people of Rome in their advertity. And if they could have bethought them-"felves of any other means befides, wherein they might flead and befriend them they would as es willingly and frankly have made presentment thereof: saying, moreover, that the Senators of "Rome should do them an high pleasure, if they would make account of all that the men of NatC" ples had, as their own; and judge them worthy, at whose hands they would vonchiase to accept "a present, much greater, and more precious in regard of the mind and affection of the givers

"than the substance and value of the thing. The Embassadors were highly thanked, as well for their liberality and munificence, as for the care they had of them; and that boll was only received which weighed leaft. About the same time, a Carthaginian spy, who for two years space had walked unknown and unsuspected, was detected and apprehended now at Rome: and after his hands were cut off, was suffered to depart. Five and twenty flaves were crucified for a conspiracy contrived in Campus Martius. The informer was made free, and had * 20000 pound of brafs bullion given him * 60 pound 7. for a reward. There were also sent Embassadors to Philip King of the Macedonians, to demand the description Dagain Demetrius Pharius, who having been vanquished in plain field, was fled unto him. Others likewise were dispatched to the Ligurians, as well to expostulate with them and complain, that they had succoured Annibal with men, money, and other munition: as also to hearken and learn (seeing they were so near) what the Boians and insubrians did or went about. Besides, a third Embassage was addressed as far as to * Illyricum, unto King Pineus, to enquire and call for the * sclavonics Tribute, whereof the term was expired and past: and if he were minded to take a longer day, than to receive hostages and pledges of him for security. See how carefull the Romans were and what a provident eye they had not with Handing the great war which lay heavily upon their necks and shoulders, to their other affairs: insomuch as no one thing in the world, how distant and remote foever, was by them neglected. But as concerning religion, and Church matters, they E made some scruple of conscience, that the Temple of Concord (which L. Muzlius, L. Deputy in Gallia, had vowed two years before in time of a fedition and mutiny of fouldiers) was not as yet fet out to workmen for to be built or edified accordingly. And therefore two Duumvirs were for that purpose created by Æmylins the Prator, or L. Governour of the City, namely, Cn. Pupiand Cafe Quintins Flaminius: who gave order, that the Temple should be built upon the Capitoll hill. The same Prator, by vertue of a decree of the Senate, sent his letters unto the Confuls, importing thus much, That if they thought good, one of them should repair to Rome for the creation of new Confuls; and that himself would summon the Parliament against that day which it should please them to appoint. The Consuls wrote back again according to the premiles. That they might not depart far from the enemy without damage of State: advising them to hold an affembly for the Election aforefaid, by authority of an interregent, rather than that one of the Confuls should be called away from the wars. But the LL, of the Senate thought it better to have a Dictator chosen by one of the Consuls, for the holding of that high Court of Parliament. So L. Veturius Philo, was nominated Dictator, and he choice for Generall of the Horsemen M. Pomponius Matho. But these men being not duly and lawfully created were commanded at the fortnights end to give over their places, and then the matter grew to an Interreign. The Confuls had their Commission, for government and conduct of the Army, continued and confirmed for one year longer. The Senators named for Interregents, first Cn. Claudius Como;

was holden, with much contention and debate between the Nobles and the Commons. The G Vulgar people endeavoured to advance unto the Confulship C. Terentius Varro, a man of their own coat and condition, one crept into good liking and favour with the common fort by oppofing himself and contesting against great personages, and by other popular practises and courses that he used to win grace among the people; as namely, by abasing the greatness of Fahius, and the Majefty of the Dictatorship : for nothing was there else in him, to commend him to the world, but a malicious mind to bring others into diffrace. The Nobles withflood the Commons all they could, to prevent this mischief; That men should not take a custome to be their equals, by means of inveighing and making head against them. mons, and kiniman to C. Terentins, blamed and accused much not only the Senate, but also the Augurs, in that they forbad the Dictator to finish and go through with the election and so by drawing them into hatred, sought to purchase favour and credit unto Terenistar his Candidate, who flood to be Conful. First, quoth he) whereas the Noblemen for many years together, sought "occasions of war, and trained Annibalinto Italy, the same perions craftily have made a long war " of it, when it might have been brought to a final end before now. Also, when it was well feen "that they might have fought a battel with the compleat power of four legions all together; leeing "that M. Minutius in the absence of Fabius had a lucky day: two legions only and no more, were "offered and exposed as it were to the enemy to be hewn in peeces: and then afterwards, they "were refcued and laved from maffacre, and the very edge of the fword: to the end that Fabius I "might be called Father and Patron: even he, who to fay a truth, first impeached the Romans for "vanquishing the enemies, before that he saved them from being vanquished. Moreover, the "Confuls that succeeded, following the same course and artificiall setches that Fabius pra-"Stifed before them, drew out the war fill on length, when they had good means of victory, and " might have fully finished it, A complot (no doubt) contrived and concluded among all the No-"bles. And never will they see to make an end of war, before there be a Consul chosen, a meer "Commoner indeed, to wit, a man never feen afore, and of the first head. For those who are of "Commoners now made noble, are all alike and of the same prosession; they draw all in one "line, and have learned one lesson; and ever since that they have lest to be contemned of the No-"bility, arefaln to despite and disdain the Commonalty. For who seeth not, that in seeking to K "have an Yoterreign, their only purpole and reach was that the Election might be full and wholly "in the power and ordering of the Nobles? That was the thing which the Confuls aimed at, in "Haying behind in Camp with the Army: & alterwards when there was a Dictator created against "their wills for to hold the great affembly for the Election, their drift was, and they wrought to, "and brought it about in the end, that the Augurs should give it out and pronounce, that there " was an errour committed in creation of the Diotator. And therefore, faith he, the Commons can-"not of all things away with theie Interreigns : and verily, one of the Confulships (at least) ap-" pertain of right to the Commons of Rome; and no doubt, the people in their free election would "more willingly make choice of one to be Conful, and confer the dignity upon him, that loved erather to win the victory at once, than to continue commander in the Army a long time. the Commons were once enkindled and set on fire with these speeches and remonstances, albeit three of the Patritii were competitors, namely, Pub, Cornelius Merenda, L. Manlius Volfo, and M. Emplius Lepidus, and two * new Noblemen, who were already familiar and aquainted with the Commons, to wit, C. Attilius Serranus, and Q. Elius Patus, of whom the one had been High Priet, and the other Augur: yet at length was C. Terentius only created Conful, to the end that the elelection should be in his power, that he might choose unto him a Collegue at his pleasure. Then the Patritians having a sufficient tryall, that their Candidates and Competitors were of small force and not able to prevail, urged and put forward L. A. mylins Paulus, who sometimes had been Conful with M. Lalius, in the condemnation as well of himself as of his companion, escaped the peril of being burnt, and was well finged and forched, as it were in the fire: a man of all M others most milchievously bent against the Commons: him they usged, I say, to stand for a Confulfhip notwithstanding he refused a long while, and alledged many reasons against it, And so the next Comitiall or Parliament day, by occasion that all the concurrents and competitors aforelaid that flood with Varro, gave place and left off their fuit, he was chosen to match with the Consul elect, for to thwart and crofs him, rather than to be affiftant unto him in the government. This done they proceeded to the election of Pretors, wherein M. Pomponius Matho, and P. Furius Philus were created Unto Pomponius fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City of Rome and unto P. Furius Philus, Detween the Citizens of Rome and forreiners. Two other Prætors besides were chosen, M. Claudius Marcellus, to be sent L. Deputy into Sicily, and L. Posthumius Albinus into Gallia, All were created in their absence, and excepting Terentins the Conful only, there was no N Magistracy conferred upon any, who had not aforetime born and exercised the same: for divers valorous and hardy men were passed over and lest out, because in such a time of trouble, it was not thought good to prefer any man to a government, wherein he was raw and unexperienced. The Armies also were augmented; but to what proportion they arole, either in Cavalry, or Infantry, I dare not fet down any thing for certainty; so greatly do authors vary both in the number and quality of the forces. Some lay, there was a new supply of 10000 souldiers enrolled. Others affirm that to the five legions there were were adjoyned four new befides, to the end they might employ nine legions in the wars. Also, that the legions were increased in number both of foot and horie: to wit, with the addition of one thouland footmen, and three hundred horiemen in every Legion: for sometime before, a Legion contained 4000 foot, and 200 horse, cal-O led Quadrata legio: whereas at first Romulus ordained it to be 3000 of the one, and 300 of the other so as a Legion consisted now of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse: and that the affociats (hould double the number of horiemen, and find even proportion of footmen with the

Some Historians have written, that at what time as the battell of Canna was fought, the Romans were in Camp 87200 strong, But in this they all agree, that the Romans warred with greater preparation, and more force and sury than in years past, because the Dictator had put them A in good hope, that the enemy might be vanquished and subdued at once. But before that these new Legions advanced under their enfigns and banners out of the City, the Decemvirs were commanded to go and perule the books of Sibylla; by reason that men were commonly put in fear, and terrified with news of strange fights and prodigious tokens. For the rumour went, that both at Rome in the Avenine, and also at Arieis, it rained flones, much about one time ; and that in the Sabins Country (which no doubt portended a great maffacre and flaughter) there issued out of a certain fountain, waters hot, with much bloud: and men were more terrified therewith, because it did fo many times together. Befides, in the ffreet called Fornicata toward Campus Martins, divers persons were biasted and smuten to death with lightning from heaven. Then were the Souldiers particularly (a thing never done before) by their Colonels, put to their corporal oath, and (worn to make their repair at the Confuls commandment, and without their leave not to depart: for until that day there passed nothing but a sacramentall parole & simple promise in general. For whensoever the horsemen resorted to their Decuries, and toomen to their Centuries; both they of the Cavalry in their Decuries, and also of the Infantry in their Centuries, sware (after a fort) voluntarily among themselves, That they would not abandon their enfigus by way of flight or upon any fear mor go out of their ranks, unless it were to fetch either some offensive armour, orto smite an enemy, or to save the life of a Citizen. Which having been aforetime a voluntary covenant & accord between themselves, was now by the martial Tribunes G or Colonels reduced to a formal and folemn oath, and bound the fouldiers to observe them same, of necessiny. Yet before the entigns fet forward and marched out of Rome, the Conful Varro dealt many hot words and brave orations in the affembly of the people, intimating & purporting thus much in effect: That the Nobles had called for war in Italy where it was like to remain long cmough, and to flick close to the ribs of the common-west, if the were ferred with many fuch Generals as Pabini was. Howbeit, "I sam thing shall fall out otherwise than well. I had rather hazard the pikes and darts of the ene"mies, and seave my like behind, me, among them, than put my self to be tried again by the voices "and suffrages of angry and testy Citizens, Paulus had no sooner delivered this speech, but (as the report goeth) the went forth on his journey, and the chief LL, of the Sena accompanied him, The their Commoner Consul was likewise attended of his favourits the Commons, more looked on & gazed at for their multitude and number, than regarded for the worth & quality of their persons. So soon as they were arrived at the Camp, and that the new army was intermingled with the old, they divided the whole army into two camps & ordred the matter fo, that the new which was the leffer should be nearer to Annibal: and in the old, the greater number and the wholestrength and flower of the main forces should be quartered. Then they sent away to Rome M. Attilius the Conful of the former year, who excused himself by reason of his old age, and defired to be gone. But they gave unto Cn. Servilius the charge and conduct of one Roman Legion, and befides of two thouland horsemen and footmen of their allies in the lesser Camp. Annibal, notwithstanding he well perceived that the power of his enemies was re-enforced by one half more than before, yet wondrous joyful he was at the comming of these new Consuls. For not on y The had nothing left him of victuals, which from day to day he purveyed for, to serve his present need and no more; but also there was no more to be had; and nothing remained for to fill his hands with; by reason that after the territory was not safe to travel in, the corn from all parts was conveyed unto the Arong walled Towns, and there laid up: fo that (as afterwards it was known for certain) he had scarce corn enough for to serve ten daies and the Spaniards, by occasion of the dearth and want, were at the point to revolt unto the Romans, if they might but elpy a good and commodious time therefore. Over and befides, to the inbred raffinels and over-hally nature of the Contul, Fortune also ministred matter to confirm him therein. For in a certain tumultuary skirmish (to trop and impeach the forragers and Plunderers of Annibal, and which began rather by chance, as the fouldiers hapned to encounter one another, than Gupon any confiderate counsel aforehand, or by direction and ommandment from the Generals) the Carthaginians had the foil, and went by the worft; for of them there were 1700 flain: but of Romans and Confederates, not passing 100. And when in the train of victory they hotly followed the chace in difarray the Conini Paulus, who that day had the absolute command (for they governed by turns each once his day) restrained and stated them. Varro thereat chased and frested crying out aloud. That he had let the every elcape out of his hands: and if he had not thus given over the purfuit, the war might have been ended at once. Anubal took this lois and dammage nothing near the heart, but rathermade full reckonieg, that he had caught

(as it were) with a bair & fleshed the auda ioniness of the fool-hasty Conful and of the new soul-H diers especially. For he knew as well all that was done amongst the enemies, as in his own Calm; namely, that the Generals were not futable nor forting one unto the other and that of three parts of the army, two in a manner were but raw tresh, and untrained souldiers. And therefore suppofine he had now got place and time favourable unto him, to contrive and compass some stratagem, the night to lowing he led forth his fouldiers, carrying nothing about them but their armour; and abandoned the Camp full of all things, as well private goods and furniture, as publike provision: and beyond the next hils, he bestowed secretly in ambush his footmen well appointed and in ordinance of battel on the left hand; and the horiemen on the right; and conveighed all his carriages into the midst between two flanks: to the end, that whiles the enemy was builted in rishing I and ransaking the tents, forlorn (as it were) and forsaken by the flight of the owners and masters, he might surprize him laden and encumbred with bag and baggage. He left nehind him in the Camp many fires burning to the end that the enemies should verify think and believe that under a precended shew of an army in Camp his purpose was to hold and keep the Consuls amuzed still where they were, whiles himself in the mean time might gain more ground and escape further away: like as he had plaid by Fabius the year before. When day-light was come, and the Coff. faw, first that the standing guards were gone, and perceived (as they approached nearer) an unwonted filen e they marvelled much. But after they discovered certainly that the Camp wasabandoned, and no person remaining behind: there was running of all hands who could runsaflet to the pavilions of the Cost, with news that the enemies were fled, in such tear as they left K their tents standing entire, and had quit the Camp wholly: and to the end their flight should be more feeret and not descried they had left light fires burning in every place. Then began they all to cry and call upon the Coff for to command the handards and engine to be brought abroad and to lead forth in pursuit of the enemies, and without any tray to make spoil and havock of their Camp. And in truth one of the Coff, was no wiler than the common foundiers, But Paulus replied, and told them ever and anon, that they were to be cir lumipeet and wary, and to look about them what they did for fear of an ambush. Yet seeing in the end no remedy and that otherwise he could neither stay the mutiny, nor rule the Captain thereof: he sent out M. Statilius (the Provost marshall) with a troop of Lucan horsemen in espiall to discover the coasts and see all were clear : who having ridden hard to the gates and given order to all the rest for to stay without the forti- L fications, himself with two horsemen besides entred within the rampire, and having looked and fearched every corner advitedly, he retired and made relation, That past all peradventure there were knaves abroad and a piece of treathery was in hand: for why, there are fires made (quoth he) on that fide only of the Camp that looked toward the enemy the pavilions fland open and all things of price and value which they fer more flore by are left at random even to fit our hands: and we have feen bendes in divers places, filver plate and coin scattered along the way here and there, as it were a bait laid to train us to a boory. These circumstances reported, of purpose to withdraw their minds from covetous and greedy desire of pillage; set them on and kindled them the more. And the lou diers had no looner cried aloud, that unless the I gnal were given, they would fet forwards without Commanders: but they had a captain flraight at hand to lead them M the way: for immediatly V. rrofounded the march, Paulus who of him est made flow half, and perceived besides that the birds in taking the Auspice, approved not this enterprise nor gavegood tokens of happy speed, gave order straightwaies that his Collegue should be advertised of the unlucky Auspice, who was ready now to set out of the gate with his standard & that in any wise he should flav. Wherewith albeit Varro was not well content, yet the late misfortune of Flaminius, and the memorable overthrow at fea of Clandius [* Pulcher] Conful in the Punick war, wrought fome scruple of conscience and sear in his heart. But it was even the fair grace of the gods (if a man may so say) and nothing else, which put by and deferred rather than impeached and inhibited the danger and deliruction that hung over the Romans heads, For as good hap was, it chanced at the very instant, when the Consul commanded the ensigns to be brought into the Camp & the fouldi-N ers would not obey him, that two flaves (who served sometime two horsemen, the one a Formian, and the other a Sidi, in and who in the year when Servil.us & Att. lius were Conjuls among other forragers were taken prisoners by the Numidians) made an escape and fled that day to their old masters again, Who being brought before the Coss, advertised them constantly, that the whole army of Annil al lay close in ambul ado on the fat ther tide of the mountains. The coming of these bordslaves to right and jump as they did, caused the souldiers to obey their Coss. Whereas the one of them by his ambitious courting and feeking unto them at the first for a Confulthip, and afterwards by his unfeemly indulgence and pleasing of them, had lost all his majesty and reputation among them.

Annibal, when he faw that the Romans rather began to ftir without ed ice, than fill to run o rashly on head to the full, and that his crarty device was disclosed and took no effect, returned again into his Camp. Where, he could not for want of corn make abode many daies: and bendes, not only sopldiers (who were not all one mans children, but a consused mixture of all Nations) ber and y'v to plot and enter into new defignments, but also their Captein himself was of many minds. For whereas they began with muttering and grumbling, and afterwards with open mouth, to demand and call for their due wages, complaining first of the dearth of victuals, and in the end, of meer hunger and famine: and withall a rumour ran, that the mercenary fouldiers,

A and the Spaniards especially, were minded and intended to give him the flip, and to turn to the enemy; Analbal likewise bethought himself otherwhiles as it was said, how he might flie into Gallia, but to, as he would leave his Infantry behind him at fix and feven, and so be gone with his Cavalry alone. As men, I say, were thus plotting and devising in the camp, he resolved at length to dislodge from then e, and to remove into the hotter countries of Apulia, where the harvest was more timely: confidering withal, that the farther he went from the enemies, his fouldiers who were by nature light-headed and inconstant, would not so easily revolt and slie from him. So he took his way by night, and made fires likewife, and lett a few tents franding in fight, that the Romans tearing the ake trains and ambush as before, might keep in, and not stir abroad. But when B as the same Statilius the Lucan, having scoured all the coalls, both beyond the camp, and the other fide of the hills, and brought word, that he had discovered the enemies afar off dismarching, then bee an they the morrow after to think and confult of making after him with hot pursute. But albeit both Confuls continued, as ever before, the same men still, that is to say, diversly minded, and perfifting in their feveral resolutions: but so, as all in a manner accorded with Varro, and none agreed unto P. ulus, but only Servilius the Conful of the former year: yet according to the opinion and counses of the major pars, they went both together (for what might hold that which fatal necessity driveth to make Come much renowned and famous for the notable overthrow and defeat of the Romans; Neer this village Annibal had encamped under the wind Vulturans, and had it on his back; which wind, when the fields are (corched and burnt with drought, is wont C to bring with it conds (as it were) of dust. Which as it was good and commodious for the very

camp it fest, o it was like to serve in special stead, when they should range their battel in orders and light, with the wind blowing on their back, against the enemy, whose eyes the dust was ready to put out flying with the wind full in their faces fo abundantly,

The Consuls having diligently learthed the wayes and tried the passages ever before them, followed Annibal hard, and so soon as they were come to Carna, had him in fight: where they for ified two camps, of like diffance almost asunder, as at Gerian; and divided their forces like as before. The river Aufidus ran close by both these camps, and yeelded watting places according as either of them had occasion and need, but not without some scussing and skirmish. But from the leffer camp, which lay on the farther fide of Aufidus the Romans had more liberty to water, beto cause upon the farther bank there was planted no sconce nor guard of the enemy. Annil al having possessed himself of a good plot of ground to his mind, commodious and meet for the service of horsemen(in which kind of forces he was invincible) ordred his battaillons in array, & by putting out certain Numidian light horse, made a bravado, and bade the Consuls battel. And even then it fell out, that both the Roman camps were disquieted and troubled anew, what with the mutiny of the fouldiers, and what with the difagreement and jarring of the Confuls: whiles Paulus laid hard unto Varro, and let before his eyes the raffinels of Sempronius and Flaminius: and Var-70 again hit him home, and twit him with the example of Fabius, which made so goodly a shew in the eyes offearful, idle, and cowardly Captains: both of them fell to protefling and calling God and man to witness, the one giving out, that the fault was not in him that Annibal was E now Lord well-neer of all Italy already, and why? because himself was kept short and tied fast enough by his Colleague, and the fouldiers whose hot blood was up, and who were eager of fight, had their weapons even plucked out of their hands: Empliss on the other side complaining, that if ought should hap amils unto the Legions thus betrayed, and offered wilfully and unconsideratly to the danger of don't ful battel, not with standing he were not blame-worthy but innocent altogether, yet should he be the first that smarted, and be partaker of the mischief and missortune: and yet he would gladly see, whether they who were so ready and hasty of their tongue to speak, would be as nimble & active of their hands to fight, when the time came. Thus whiles they fpend time in chopping of Logick & quarrelling one with another, rather then in good & fober confultations, Annibal who had flood arranged a good part of the day ready to fight, minding to retire his F other forces into his camp lent forth certain Numidians out of the battel to charge upon the Romans on the other fide of the river, who from the leffer camp went for water. There being a difordered & confused multitude, were not fully landed on the bank, but with the shout only & tumult of the Numidians, they were discomfitted and put to flight: whereupon the enemy rode farther, even to the standing Corps de guard, quartered before the rampart, and hard at the very gates of the Roman camp. This was fuch an indignity offered to the Romans, to fee themselves now thus braved and bearded even in the very camp by the auxiliary fouldiers, and the raftal fort of the enemies, that there was no other thing stayed the Romans from passing the river presently, and embattelling themselves, but only this, that it was Paulus his turn that day to have the soveraign command of all. And therefore the morrow after, when it came to Varro his course for to rule, * That is a

G without any advice of his companion, he put forth the * figual of battel, and with all his forces fearles caffock put in order of battel, went over the river. Paglas also followed after him, as one who might out of the Gewell enough millike and disallow the purpose of his Colleges, but of the millike and disallow the purpose of his Colleges. well enough mislike and disallow the purpose of his Collegue, but otherwise could neither will lion nor chuse, but second him, and takepart in the execution. Being once over the river, they join The memoras allothe forces which they had in the imaller camp, unto the other: and in this manner they or ble battel of dred the battel. In the right point which was neerer to the river, was arranged the Roman Ca- canna. valry, and after them the footmen. The left point on the outfide, was flanked with the horimen of the affociats: within stood their Infantry: but in the middle part were bestowed the Archers and loofe fhot, close to the main battel of the Roman Legions; and of all the rest of light armed H auxiliary fouldiers, confided the van-guard. The Confuls led both the points, Terentius the left. Emylius the right, Cn. Servilius had the conduct of the main battel. Now Annibal by the break of day, having fent before the Baleare flingers, and his other light armor, passed over the river, and marshalled them in battel array, ever as they came to land. The horse as well Gauls as Spaniards. he opposed in the left point, neer to the bank, even against the horesemen of the Romans: the right confifted of the Numidian light horse: and the main battel was strengthned and fortified with his Infantry : but in such manner as the Affricans flanked both, in manner of wings: and between them were bestowed the Gauls and the Spaniards in the midst. A man that had seen the Affricans, would have taken most of them for Romans, so armed were they with Roman armor, t gotten much of it at Trebia, but most of all at Thrasymenus. The Frenchmen and Spaniards had rargets neer of one fashion, but their swords were unlike and far differing. Those of the Gauls were very long and not pointed. But the Spaniard, whose manner is rather to fight with the thrust and to foyn, then to sash and strike edglong, had handsome short curtilasses, and sharp ar the point. And after this fort flood these two nations armed before the rest (terrible to behold both for the bigness of their persons, and also for their habit and attire.) The Gauls all from the navel upward naked: the Spaniards with linnen wastcoats or jackets, glittering wondrous bright, bordred and embroidered with purple and scarlet. The compleat number of all, as well horse as footmen, that flood embattelled, amounted (as they report) unto forty thousand foot, and ten thoufand men of arms. These Captains had the leading of the two points, to wit, Asdrabal comman & ded the left, Maharbal the right. Annibal himle fin person with his brother Mago, conducted the middle battel. The Sun shone sidewise upon the slanks both of the one and also of the other army, very indifferent and commodious to both parts were it that they were so placed and marshalled offer purpose, or chanced at adventure so to stand: the Romans with their faces full south, the Carthaginians into the north. But the wind which the inhabitants of that country call Vulturnus, arose and blew full upon the faces of the Romans, and raised such store of dust, and drave it fo upon their eyes, that it took away their fight and prospect. The cry and shout began on both fides, and the Auxiliary fouldiers put themselves forth first to skirmish, and charged one another with their light shot. Then the left point of the Gauls and Spanish men of arms encountred and ran full upon the right hand of the Romans Cavalry, nothing at all after the order of t horle-service, for they were of necessity to affront one another straight sorward, as having no room lest about them to fling out and ride at large, being flanked on the one hand with the river, and enclosed on the other with the battaillon of footmen. Whernpon I fay, they were forced to charge full butt from both parts, directly before them fo long as their horses stood close and thrust together: but at length when they began to stir and wince, the riders, man to man, fell to take hold and claspe one another and every man to pluck his enemie besides his horie, so as now they were driven much what to fight on foot. This conflict was rather sharp then long : and to be short, the Roman Cavalry was discomfited and put to flight. And anon, as the horse made an end of their fight, beganthe skirmish of the foot also. At the first the Gauls and Spaniards equal to their enemies both in force and courage maintained the conflict right hardily, and kept their order and M arraies. At length the Romans cast about and devised on what side, and with what form of a close battaillon, to force back that pointed squadron of the enemies, ranged very thin, and by so much the weaker, and bearing out withal, from the rest of the battel. Now when they had once driven them to retreat, and give ground, the Romans pressed on still at one instant, and with the same violence pier ed through them as they fled for fear headlong, until they were entred as far as to the very midst of the vanguard and main battel ; and finding none able to stand in their way and make refistance, they gained in the end the very rereward of the Africans: who having drawn in from both fides their skirts and wings, flood together flrong, and firmly kept their ground. The Gauls and Spaniards continued fill in the midft, form what advanced without the reft of the battel. Now when this pointed foundron was driven in by the Romans, and made even and equal first N with the front of the battel, and afterwards upon farther enforcement, gave way for them to pals in a lane through the midst thereofiby that time the Africans charged upon their flanks and whiles the Romans unwarily were engaged over far within them, they came about them on the skirts, and within a while having stretched out and spread their wings, enclosed the enemies round on their backs also. Hereupon the Romans who had performed one battel and conflict in vain, were forced to give over the Gauls and Spaniards whom they had disaraied and put to flight; and were to begin a fresh fight with the Africans : and that to their own great difadvantage ; not only because they being enclosed and pent up in a straight room, were to deal with them that had compassed them all about and were at liberty; but also because they being wearied, were to maintain a new skirmish with those that werefresh in heart, and lufty. And now by this time, in the left O point of the Romans battel, where the horsemen of their affociats were marshalled to affir in the Numicians they we e faln to close fight: which at the first these Numidians began but coldly and faintly, after the deceitful manner of Carthaginians, unto whom they were fast and neer neighbours. For 500, of them or thereabout, having besides their usual javelins and darts which they commonly carry, thort daggers or skeins hidden under their cuirass and harness, made temblance of riding away from their own companies, and fiding to the Romans, with their bucklers at their backs, all of a judden dismounted from their horses, and throwing their bucklers, targets,

A and spears at their enemies feet, were received within the main hanel and from thence condiched to the hindmost in the rereward, were commanded there to abide behind at their back. And until fuch time at the skirmith joined on all findes, they continued durer. But when they faw every mans eve and mind bulied and occupied in the conflict, shencier caught up those buckless that lay, firewest and feattered among the dead bodies alkabroad, rand played upon the battel of the Romans from behind: and what with wounding their backs; & cutting their handrings, they made fool work and flaughter among them, and more then that, raifed a greater fear and tumple by far, Now when the Romans in one place were frighted and ran away, and in another fought for life, struct only with delpair of all means to eleage: Aldrubal who had the charge of that side, Beanfel the Numidian horiemen; who lought but coldly with those that flood affront them, to be withdrawn from the midlt of the battel, and fent themes purimethe enemies in the chair. And to the Affiricans over, weary now with execution and killing, rather then with any other fight, he joined the Gauls and Spanish footmen to affilt them. On the other side of the battel, Paulus, albeit at the very first shock and encounter; he was fore wounded with a bullet from out of a sling, yet oftentimes he made nead against Annibal, and kept his battaillons close and thick together, yea, and in divers places required the conflict, and ever more the Roman horiemen guarded and protected him. But at the last they left their horses, because the Conful his strength failed him to rule his own, and to fit him. Whereupon there was one brought word unto Annibal, that the Conful had Commanded his men of arms of light afoot. Then (quoth Annibal, as the report goeth) Yea, mar-C.ty: But how make gladder would I be, if he delivered them into my hands bound hand and foot? And surely the horsemen sought to after they were alighted, as if there had been no doubt, but that the enemy had the victory, Howbeit, although they had the worfe, yet they chofe rather to die in the place, then to flig: and the victors angred at the heatt with them for thus staying the accomplishment of the victory, went down with them, and killed outright all those whom they could not make to give ground and yeeld. And yet a few such as were wearied with much toil and overcharged with many wounds they enforced to retreat. Anon they were all difbanded and scattered alunder and as many as could, recovered their horses, and fled away. "Cn. And then the camp was furrendered to the enemy, by those that were hurt and heartless, upon the same conditions that the other was. A rich booty was there gotten: and fetting ande horses, and men, and filver, which R they used much in trappings and capacitons of their hories, (for fouldiers, be ye sure, occupied very little filver, either in their own appartel, or at their boord) all the pillage was given to be rifled and ranfacked amongst them. Then he gave commandment, that the dead bodies of his own men should be gathered together for to be buried. And as men say, they were to the number of eight thousand, all right valiant and hardy men. C. Now, there were amongst them four Colonels, namely, F. shius Max. of the first Legion, whose father had been Dictator the year before; and L. Publicius Bibulus, of the second Legion, together with P. Cornel, Scipio, and Appius Claudius Pulcher of the third Legion, who had been Ædile but lately afore: and by general confent of them all, P. Scipio, a very young man, and Ap. Claudius were chosen to bear the soveraign rule, and to have the absolute command and conduct of the army. But as they fat with some few others, in counsel together about the mannaging of their main affairs, behold P. Furim Philus, whose father had been a Consul, gave them to understand, that all their consultations were in vain, and that they did but softer and cherish a soolish hope of an overthrown state : for the Common-weal was in a desperate case, past all cure, and remediless. Alfo that certain noble young Gentlemen, of whom L. Cecilius Metellus was the principal, minn ded nothing elie but to take sea, and were ready to embark, to abandon It aly, and to fly for succor to some King or other. This evil tidings as it was most grievous and heavy in it self: so falling out as it did, presently upon other missortunes so suddenly and unlooked for, put them into their dumps, and wonderfully amazed and aftonied them all. And when they that were present in place laid their heads together, and thought good to call others to counsel upon this point, Scipio a young man, even then predestined to be the fatal Captain of this war, answered: What do we here? (quoth he) it is no time now to fit confulting in fo great extremity, but leaving all discourfes, presently roproceed to action, and to do some exploit. As many therefore as are willing to fave the Common-weal, take arms and go with me forthwith for no where are our enemies (to fay a truth) encamped against us more, then where such designments are plotting and contriving. E Forth he went with a few following after him, unto the lodging of Metellus: and finding therethe young Gentlemen afore aid, close together in counsel thereabout : he drew his fword, and brandisht it naked over their heads, as they sat in consultation. " I swear before you all (quoth he) "and I swear from my very heart, and no man urgeth me thereto, that I for my part, will neither "forfake the Common-weal, nor fuster any Citizen else of Rome to abandon her. And if I fail wit-"ting and willing, then confound me O Jup. Opr. Max. and bring a most shameful end upon my "house, my family, and all that I have. Swear thou O L. Cecilius after me, as I have done, I ad-"vise thee : and ye all that are here present take the same oath : for whosoever shall refuse, know "he affuredly, that upon him I have drawn this fword. Hereat they being no less terrified, then if they had feen the Conqueror himself Annibal in person, took the oath every one, and yeelded r themselves unto Scipio, forto be kept in ward to serve against Annibal.

At the lame time, whiles these things were working at Canusium, there arrived at Venusia, upon four thousand foot and horsemen together, such as in their flight had been separated asunder all over the fields, and repaired unto the Consul there. The Venusins took order for them all, that they should be gently entertained, and carefully tended, and divided into several honses: and they bestowed upon the horsemen, a fide cassock, a coat, and * 25. & fasfornow their number was rifen to be ten thousand. Then Appins and Scipio having intelligence the same than that the other Conful was alive and well, dispatched a messenger presently, to advertise him how Desarius: calmany footmen and horlemen there were in all with them and to know his pleasure with al, whe-led so of Quather he would command the army to be brought unto Vennsia, or abide fill at Canusum. But Varior drawn ro (the Conful) of his own accord brought his forces to Canufium. So as by this time, they made with four hora pretty good shew of a Consular army, and seemed sufficient to defend themselves, if not by ses, represenforce of arms in the field, yet at least wife, with the strength of walls within the town. But the ted on the one news came to Rome, that there was not formuch as this finall remnant left of Citizens and fide of the Consederates together: but that the two Confuls and both the armies were put all to the swords: and hewn in pieces to the last man, Never was there known lo great a terrour and turmoil with. in the walls of Rome (and the City still remaining in fafety.) I will therefore even at first, fink under my load and faying nothing at all : and never will kgo about to recount those things by difcourse of words, which in reporting, I should make less then they were indeed. For there went not now, a flying rumor first of one foil, and then of another; to day of this loss, and to morrow of that; as the year before, when the Conful and his army were defeated at Thralymeneus; but manifold overthrows together were multiplied and altogether at once to wit, how both the Confuls were flain, and two Conjular armies loft: no camp, not a pavilion of the Romans left flanding: neither Leader nor Souldier remaining alive: and how Annibal was now become Lord of Apulia, of Samnium, and well neer of all Italy tull and whole. And verily, there is not (I suppose) a nation under the cope of heaven befides, but would have been overwhelmed and crushed utterly under the huge heap and heavy weight of so great a ruin & overthrow. Should I compare therwith the defeat and foil that the Carthaginians received at the Island Agates, in a conflict at feat wherewith they were so quelled, and their backs so broken, that at one clap they lost Sicilia and Sardinia both, and that which more is, yeelded themselves tributaries and subjects to the people of Rome, Or should I make comparison of their unfortunate and unhappy battel in Africk afterwards? wherein this very same Annibal gave overplay, yeelded the bucklers, and confessed himself vanquished. Nay, they are not any way comparable with this, but only that they were born and fupported with less courage, and valour of mind.

Well, to proceed, P. Furius Philus, and M. Pomponius the Pretors, affembled the Senat in the K Court Holtilia, for to consult about the defence and guard of the City; for they made no doubt, but now that the armies were both defeated the enemy would speedily come to assault Rome, the only piece of work, and warlike service that remained behind undone. But being to seek what counsel to take, and what remedy to devise for redress of these calamities, so exceeding great and grievous, and yet not known to the full, and interrupted and shrewly troubled besides with the clamorous noises and plaints of women: whiles that in every house almost, they ceased notto mourn, weep, and wail confusedly, as well for the quick as the dead (because as yet it was not o-"penly and for certain known who were alive, and who were flain.) Then Fahius Max. gave "his opinion, that certain light horsemen should be made out and sene forth by the highways Ap-1. But for the LL, of the Senarthus much, that confidering there were few Magistrates "at home, and those not able to rid the City of this tumultuous and fearful hurliburly, therefore M "they should take upon themselves, to debar the dames and women for coming abroad, and " force them every one to keep home, and tarry within doors; to reftrain the plaints and outcres " of housholds and families ! to cause silence throughout the City; to take order that all Boss, "and messengers of news, should be brought before the Pretors; and that every man should at-"tend at home the tidings, good or bad, that concerned himself, or his own state. Over and be-"fides, that they should set warders at the gates, to see that no person went out of the City and "compel every man to hope for no other earthly fafety for themselves, but in the preservation of "the City, and walls thereof. And when the tumult and hurry is once hufbt, then (quoth he) "may the Senators well be called again into the Councel-House, and consult for the desence and "fafeguard of the City. When all the affembly liked well, and approved of this opinion, and wenty, every man on Fabius his fide without contradiction, so as the market place, by authority of the Magistrates, was cleared and voided of the multitude, and the Senators were divided and gone fundry ways to appeale the uproars: then at last, came letters from Terestius the Conful, importing, that L. Emyleu the Conful was flain together with the army : that himself was at Confium, busie in rallying the reliques of so great an overthrow, as it were after a shipwrack upon the fea: and there were ten thousand souldiers of them, or very nere, and those much out of frame and good order. As for Annibal, he fat fill now at Canna, bufily occupied about the ranfoming of prisoners, and intentive to the rest of the spoil and pillage: not measuring the victory with the mind and courage of a conqueror, nor yet after the guife and manner of a noble warrior and great commander. Then were the privat and particular losses also divulged and spread abroad through o every man his house and family, and the whole City was so filled with forcow and lamentation, that the Anniversary solemnity of facrifices to Ceres was forelet, because it was not lawful for those that mourned to celebrate the same: and there was not a matron throughout the City, but was in heaviness and forrow for the time. Lest therefore other sacrifices likewise, as well publick as privat, upon the same occasion, should be neglected and discontinued, there passed an Act of the Senat, by vertue whereof a term was prefixed, to make an end of mourning within this-ty days. Now was the trouble of the City no fooner allayed, and the Senators called again

A into the Councel-Honfe: but to mend the matter, there were other letters brought out of Sicila from T. Octacilius the Vice-pretor, notifying thus much, That the realm of Hiero was much wafed by the Carthaginian navy : and when he would have succoured him at his earnest fuit and petion, there was another Armado ready rigged, decked and furnished, riding by the Islands Eggates, waiting the opportunity of the time, that when the Carthaginians perceived once that he had turned and bent hisforces to the defence of the coast and river Syracule, they might immediatly fet upon Lilybaum, and the rest of the Roman province. And therefore in case they were minded to aid and maintain a confederate King, and defend the Realm of Sicily, they must of necessity rig and man another fleet out of hand. When the letters both of the Conful and also of the Vice-Pre-

B tor were read, agreed it was, and thought meet, that M. Claudius, Admiral of the fleet which rid in the harbour of Ostia, should be sent unto the army at Canussium, and letters be dispatched withal unto the Conful, willing him upon the delivery of the army unto the Pretor, to repair unto Rome with all speed possible, and not fail, so far forth as he might, without any detriment and hindrance of the Common-weal. Besides these so great losses and adversities, men were put in sear with fundry prodigious tokens: and among others, in that one year, two Vestal Virgins, Opimia, and Floronia, were detected and attainted of manifest whoredom: the one of them was buried quick, as the manner was, under the ground at the gate Collina, the other killed her felf, L. Can-quick, as the manner, was, miner the Bishops, whom now they call * Minores Pontifices) the party * The Pery who had committed fornication with Floronia, was by the chief or high Priett to beaten with rods or Minor Pre-C in the Comitium, that he died under his hand. This heinous tack, and enormous offence falling lates, out among so many missortunes and salamities, was reckoned, I say, (as usually it is) for a portentous fign; and therefore the Decemvirs were commanded to fearth and perule the Books of Sibylla. And Q. Fabius Piltor was fent to Delphos, to confult with the Oracle there of Apollo, and to learn, by what prayers and supplications they might pacific the gods, and what would be the end of so great and fearful miseries. In the mean while, out of the learning contained in those books of destinies, there were performed certain extraordinary Sacrifices: among which, a Frenchmantogether with a French woman; likewise a Grecian man and woman, were let down alive in the beast market into a vault under the ground stoned all about: a place aforetime embrued and polluted with the blood of mankind facrificed, but not according to the ceremonies and religin on of the Romans. When they had sufficiently (as they thought) pacified the gods, M. Claudius Marcellus sent from the haven of Ostia for the defence and guard of the City, 1500, souldiers; whom he had levied and enrolled for the service at sea. Himself having sent afore the legion belonging to the Armado (which was the third) with Theanes Siducinus a Colonel, and delivered the fleet unto P. Furius companion with him in commission: within sew days after made haste, and with great journeys arrived at Cannsium, At Rome, by vertue of the Authority of the Senators, M.

Junius was created Dictator, and T. Sempronius General of the horie, who proclamed a muster, and enrolled all the younger fort above 17. years old, yea, and some also under that age, that yet

were in their * Pretexta, and were not come to * Toga virilis. Of these were made up four legions * It was the were in their * Praexta, and were not come to 1000 wirths, of these were made up 1000 wirton full, and a thouland horiemen. Likewise they sent unto their Allies, and namely, to the Latine nauppergarment
E tion, to receive souldiers from thence according to the form of the league: giving commandman children ment, that harnels, weapons, and all other habiliments of war, should be in readiness. Also to used unit they furnish out the army, they plucked from the Temples, and publick Galleries and walking Places, were fully it. the ancient spoils and armor of their enemies. And for very need and want of free men, they were the ancient spoils and armor of their enemies. And for very need and want of free men, they were compelled to devise a new kind of mustering never used before: for they bought up in open market; with the City money, 8000, butly strong young men, meer bond-slaves: but they demanded the otherwise they demanded they are the other they demanded they are the other they demanded they demanded they demanded they are they demanded they demanded they are the are they are t first of every one by himself, whether they were willing to serve in the wars, and so they put called Pma, & them in armor. And they thought it better to take up and levy fouldiers thus, then to redeem and any out @. buy again their own who were captives, albeit they might have been ranformed for smaller sums because it was buy again their own who were captives, albeit they might have been raniomed for minner forms of money. For Annibal, after this fo fortunate field fought at Ganna, fetting his mind wholly up-without any

F on the affairs belonging to an absolute conquest, rather then any more wars; caused his captives purple, which to be brought forth, and severed the Roman consederates apart from the rest; and unto them they put on at (as he had done aforetime at Trebia, and the Lake Thrasymenus) he spake graciously, and sent 17them home unrantomed. The Romans also he called unto him, and gave them kind and loving words, more then ever he had done before. "What? we and the Romans (quoth he) war not "mortally and deadly one with the other to the utmost : nay, our quarrel is rather for honour "and foversignty. And as my father and progenitors afore me, were subdued of the Romans, and "yeelded at length to their valor and prowers: so the only thing that I seek for, and indeavor unto « is this, That they likewife in their alternative turn, may give place unto my felicity and vertue " together. And therefore I grant the Romans this favor and liberty, to redeem their prisoners:

G" and this shall be the ransom, for every man of arms I demand 500, Quadrigats, 300 for a foot-man, and 100, for a bondman. And albeit the horsemens ransom was somewhat inhanced, above that sum which they capitulated for, when they yeelded, yet glad they were to accept of any condition and covenant, what soever. So it was agreed, that ten out of them should be chosen by voices, togo to Rome unto the Senat : and he took no other pledge for assurance of them but their oath, that they would return again. With them was sent Carthalo, a Noble man of Carthage with commission (if he could perceive haply the Romans encline to peace) to offer unto them conditions, and to capitulate with them. They were not fo foon gone out of the camp, but one of them (a man of no Roman na ture and disposition) made semblance, as if he had forgotten H somewhat behind him, and so to discharge himself (for sooth) of his oath, returned into the camp, and before night overtook his company again. When word was brought, that they were coming to Rome, there was a Lictor feur out to meet Carthalo upon the way, and to warn him in the name of the Dictator, before night to depart out of the confines of the territory of Rome. But the Committees of the Captives had audience granted them in the Senat-house by the Dictator.

The Oration

And the principal man among them, Marcus Junius, spake in this manner. "Right honourable, and my very good LL, of the Senat, There is not one of you all ignorant. of M. Junim to a that nener any City what foever, hath been at lefs charge for redeeming of priloners taken in "wars, and made fo small regard of them, then ours. Bur if we be not blinded in our own con-"teit, and think better of our cause, then there is reason: never were there any souldiers that fell "into the hands of our enemies, more to be accounted of by you then we are. And why? We yeel-"ded not our weapons in battel for cowardize and fear, but after that we had flood well neer un-"til night fighting over the dead bodies of our fellows flain, and so maintained the fight to the "very last, then we retired our selves into the camp. The rest of the day and night following, "notwithstanding we were weary with travel, and faint of our hurts, yet we manfully defended "onr rampart. The morrow after, when we were befet and invested round about by the conque-" rors army, yea, and excluded from water, and faw no other hope at all to break through our e-"nemies, ranged to tirong and close together, and thinking it not a matter of reproof, and against " the law of arms, that when 50000, of our Citizens were flain in field, some Roman fouldiers. "should remain alive after the battel of Canna; then and not afore, we agreed upon a fum of "money, that being rantomed, we might be fet at large, and so we yeelded unto the enemies our "weapons, wherein now we saw no help at all. We have heard likewise, that our ancestors re-"deemed themselves from the Gauls with a sum of gold: and our fathers also, notwithstanding "they were most straight laced, and hardly brought to capitulate and compound for peace, yet "fent Embassadors to Tarentum, for to redeem their captives : and both those battels, first in Ita-"In with the Gauls, and then before Heraclea with Pyrrhus, were not so ignominious and shame-"ful for the losse it self, as for the fright and beastly running away. But the plains of Canna are " covered all over with heaps of Roman bodies; and we that be here had not remained alive af-"ter them, but that the enemies strength held out no longer, nor their word would serve to kill r " any more. And yet there be some of our men also who fled not back in battel: but being left "behind to guard the camp, were taken priloners by the enemy as well as we, at what time as it "was surrendred into their hands, Certainly, I envy not the fortune, nor repine at the welfare and "good estate of any Citizen or fellow souldier, neither would I be thought the man, who by de-" basing another, would seem to advance my self. But even they verily (unless peradventure good "footmanship and swift running deserve reward) who for the most part fled out of the field un-" armed, and never flinted before they gat Venusia or Canusium over their heads, cannot justly pre-" fer themselves before us, nor boatt and glory, that they stand the Common weal in better stead "then we, Find them you shall (I doubt not) good men and valorous souldiers: so shall you us "too, yea, and more ready to do true service to our country, in that by your bounty and good M "means we have been ranfomed and testored again into our country. Ye have levied fouldiers of "all ages and degrees, and I hear say, there be 8000, bondmen in arms. We are no fewer in num-" ber our telves, and redeemed we may be with as small moneys as they are bought, I say no more "but to, for if I should make farther comparisons between us and them, I must do wrong to the "Roman name and nation. This is a special thing moreover (my LL.) which in mine advice ye " are duely to confider in this deliberation, in case ye be so hard-hearted, as to have no regard of "us, or of our defett, namely, in whatenemies hand ye leave us. It is with Pyrrhus peradventure, "who used us being his prisoners, like friends and guests. Nay, is he not a Barbarian and Cartha-"ginian? who whether he be more covetous or cruel, can hardly be imagined. O that ye faw the " irons and chains, the nafty filthiness and foul usage of your Citizens. I am affured, you would N " be no less moved and affected to compassion at the sight thereof, then if ye beheld on the other "fide your Legions lying flain all over the plains and fields of Canne. Ye may observe and behold "the forrowful chear, and falt tears of our kinsfolk standing here in the porch and entry of this "Court, and waiting for your answer. And if they so fare, and are so pensive for us, and for them "that are absent, what heavy hearts have they themselves (think ye) whose liberty and whose " life lieth now a bleeding? And in good faith, if so be Annibal himself would, contrary to his "nature, be respective and merciful to us, yet should we think our lives did us small good, so long "as we are reputed of you unworthy to be ransomed and redeemed. There returned in times past " to Rome certain captives, fent home by Pyrrhus without any ransom paid, but the returned ac-" companied with Embassadors, right honorable personages of this City, who had been sent for O "their redemption. And shall I return unto my country again not essented a Citizen worth

But I fear more the hazard of honor and good name, "left we should be thought condemned and rejected by you. For the world will never believe, "that, you did it to spare your purse, and to save money.
When he had made an end of his speech, immediatly the multitude who were gathered together in the common place, fer up a lamentable and piteous cry, and held out their hands unto the

a Councel-houte, befeeching the LL of the Senat to let them have and enjoy their children, their brethren, and kinstolk again, The very women alto, for fear and necessity, thrust themistives among this preis of men in the market place, But when all others besides the Senitors were worked they began to debateand confult about the matter in hand. Great variance there was in abinion. Some thought it realou, that their ranfom were disturfed out of the common theft others were of mind, that she City should be at no charge at all for their redemption : marry they would not be againfair, but that they might be enlarged and delivered at their own toft and expenses. And in cate there were any that had not ready coin enough for prefent payment, the chamber of the City thould lend them money, to as the people might have good recurriey, as well by fureries B bound, asby their good and lands, morgaged for the fatisfaction of that debt. And when T Manling Torquarus, a man of the old world for precife feverity, and as most folk thought too too hard and auftere in this point, was demanded his opinion, he spake, by report, to the caple in this

Nay, but to Appeals what I think, my fentence is (my LL.) that these fellows deserve no more to be ransomed. "then those to be delivered unto Annibal, who issued out of the camp, pierced through the midl "of the enemies, and most valiantly saved themselves for to do service another day in their connstry, When Manlius had faid, albeit the prisoners were allied neer in kindred to most of the Senators; yet over and besides the precedent of the City it felf, which never from the full beginning favoured the redemption office fouldiers, as inferred the neltwes to be taken priloners: the ransom it fell, which amounted to a good round sum made the rot pause; because they were unwilling both to empty the publick treasury; (having already disbursed great sums, in buying up bond flaves, and arming them for the wats) and also that Annibal (who as the voice went; was at a very great fland for money) should be enriched therby. When this their answer was resumed, M 15hWite No redemption of captives; there was a new fit of weeping and wailing afresh added to the former fortow of the people, namely for the loss of for many Citizens and fo with many a tear that they shed, with fundry plaints and moans which they made, they accompanied the Commisters abovelaid, as far as the gate. One of the ten went home to his house the same time; who unona fraudulent and cautelous return made into the enemies camp, as is aforelaid, supposed he had arguer himself and disburdened his conscience of his oath. Which being known and recounsed to she Senat, they were all of mind that he should be apprehended, and attended with a good and influent guardat the charge of the City, and so carried back to Annibal. There goeth another report of these Captines, that first there came ten of them as Committees; and when it was debated in the Senat, and doubt made, whether they thould be admitted into the City or no N they were at length received, but to, as that they had no audience in the Senat : and upon longer Gaumadethen they looked for, three others followed after them, to wit, L. Scribonist, G. Calpurmina and L. Manhus. Then by mediation of one Tribun of the Com, a kiniman of Scribenius, the master was propounded in the Senat concerning the ranfom of the captives; but granted it would not be: whereupon the three latter Committees returned to Annibal, and cher tenthet fint came; remained fill behind : who upon a colourable occasion, had made an errand back to dusibal, when they were well onward on their way, to take a note, for footh, of the names of the ptifoners, and therebystemed to have disharged their conscience of the oath. Also, that in the Senat, there was hard hold, much question and variance, about the delivering of them again, into the hands of Annibaliand how at last, they who were of opinion to have them gendered and lent back, failed of their purpole, by reason they came short by some voices and opinions, and that theoother fide carried it clean away, But by the next Cenforsthat came in place, they were lo marked and branded, with alk notes of difgrace and shame, that some of them immediatly made themselvs away with their own hands and the reft forbare, not only the common place and market all their life time after, but allo came not abroad, in manner, to be feen in the very fixeet, and never loaked out of their doors. Thus a man may sather marvel, that authors should so differ among themA felves, than from any of them pick out and differn the truth. But how much greater, this overthrow and loffe at Canna was, than any other before time, appeareth by this evident argument in that those Allies, which ever to that day flood fast and fire unto them, now sell to shrink and fail: and furely for no earthly thing elfe, but because they began to despair of the main chance of the whole State and Empire. For hereupon there revolted unto the Carthaginians, the Attellans, the Calatins, the Hirpins, a part of the Apulians, all the Samnits, except the Petellins, all the Brutti in general, and the Lucans, And more then these, the Surrentins, and the whole trast wellneer, of the Greeks along the sea coast. The Tarentins, Metapontins, the Crotonians, the Locians, and all the Gauls within the Alps, And yet for all these defeats, and rebellions of their Allies B and Subjects, were not the Romans one whit enclined to make any mention of peace, neither before the coming of the Conful, nor yet after that he was returned, and renewed again the dolorous remembrance of that woful overthrow received. And even at that very inftant so high minded was the City, and so far from drooping and being cast down, that as the Con'ul returned homeward from fogreat a defeat, whereof himself only was a principal cause, he was not only met upon the way by all the States and companies of the City in great numbers, but also highly thanked, in that he despaired not of the State of the Common-weal: who, if he had been the General and Leader of the Carthaginians, should have been sure to have smoaked for it, and endured all extremity for torment and punishment.

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and twentieth Book.

He Campans revolted unto Annibal, Mago was fent to Catthage, with news of the victory at Canna: and in the entry of the Councel-House; he poured out (on the stoor) the golden rings which had been plucked from the fingers of the Romans there flain, which by report exceeded the measure of a Modius. Upon these tidings, Hannothe noblest personage among all the Carthaginians, perswaded with the Senat of Catthage, to sue unto the people of Rome for peace, but he prevailed not, by reason of the Barchin fide and fattion, that gain-faid him. Cl. Marcellus the Pretor fought fortunatly before Nola, in a fally which he made out of the town against Annibal. The Army of Annibal fell to riot at Capua E and gave themselves to such sensuality, while they wintred there, that both in bodily strength, and also in courage of mindthey became much enfeebled. Casilinum was besieged by the Carthaginians, and the inhabitants within were driven by extreum famine, to eat thongs and leatherings, plucked from off their fields and targets, yea, and to feed upon Mise and Rats. They lived with Nuts which the Romans sent unto them down the river Vulturnus. The body of the Senat was replenished by receiving unto them a new Supply from out of the order of Knights or Gentlemen, to the number of 197. L. Polhumius the Pretor. was together with his army defeated by the Gauls, and put to the word. Cneus and Publius Scipioes. vanquilbed Aldrubal in Spain, and had the conquest thereof. The remnant of the army descated at Canna was fent away and confined into Sicily, and commanded not to depart from thence, before the war was fully finished. A league and society was concluded between Philip the King of the Macedonians and F Annibal, Sempronius Gracchus the Conful, discomstited and slew the Campans. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits archieved by T. Manling the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, against the Carthaginians and the Sardi: who took the General himself Asquibal, together with Mago and Hanno, prisoners. Claudius Marcellus the Pretor vanquished and defeated in a let battel before Nola, the army of Annibal: and was the first that put the Romans in some good hope of better success, after they had been toiled out with so many foils and losses.

The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Nnibal after the hattel fought at Canne, and the winning and ranfacking of both the Roman camps, diflodged anon, and was removed out of Apulia into Samnium, being fent unto, for to come unto the Hirpins country, by Statist, who promited to betray and deliver the City of Cooffa into his hands. Now there was a Citizen of Cooffa, named Trebius a nobleperionage and of great name in his country. But the bend and faction of the Coffanes (a family of great power, by favour of the Romans) kept. him down and over-weighed him: but after the fame of the battel of Canna and the coming of Annibal, divulged and blown abroad by the the speeches of Trebius those Cossanes abandoned the City; and so was it without any conflict rendered unto the Carthaginians, and received a garrilon. Annibal leaving behind him there, all the pillage and baggage that he had, divided his army into two parts : giving Mago in charge. to posses himself of the towns of that country, which would revolt of themselves from the Romans: or elfe to force them thereunto, in case they denied and refused so to do. Himself took his journey through the land of Campane, toward the nether sea, intending to assault Naples. that he might be Lord of a Port Town also, and have it at his devotion. When he was entred the confines of the Neapolitans, he placed some of the Numidians in Ambush, as cunningly as he could, (and there for the most part, the wayes are hollow, and full of close and fectet mooks and holes others he commanded to make a shew of driving away a booty out of the fields. and to ride out braving before the gates of the City, Against whom feeming to be not many, and those disordered) a troop of horsmen issued forth, but the enemies of purpose giving back and reniring from them, led and trained them on, to the place of ambush: and so they were environed on every fide, and there had not one of them escaped alive, but that the sea was neer, where they espied many fisher boats along the shore on the bank side, and as many of them as were skilful in fwimming gat unto them, and faved themselves: but in that shirmish nevertheless certain young gentlemen were flain, Among whom, Hegeas also, the Captain of that Corner of horiemen died in the place, who followed too horly upon them that retreated & seemed to file, But Annibal after he had viewed the walls, and faw they were not easie to be won, was discouraged and scared K from giving affault to that City, From thence he turned his journey, and took his way to Capua, a City flowing in wealth and superfluity of all pleasures, by reason of long selicity, and the favorrable aspect of gracious fortune. But among all corruptions that there raigned, it was infected most with the licentions looseness of the Commons, who exceeded beyond all measure, and abufed their liberty. Paruvius Calavius, a man of noble race there, and popular withal, but one than by lewd and indirect courses became rich and mighty, by means thereof, had both Senat & Com. under his girdle, and might do what he would. This man chanced to be head Magistrate the same year that the Romans were defeated and overthrown at the Lake Thrasymenus: and supposing that the Commonalty (who had been a long time maliciously affected to the Senat and Nobility) would by occasion of alteration in the State, enterprise some notable act, to wit, (in case Annibal x should come with his victorious army into those parts) the murdering of the Senat, and delivering of Capua into the Carthaginians hands. This man I say, lewd and bad enough otherwise, but yet not flark naught and wicked in the highest degree: and defirous to lord it, and domineer with the lafety of the Common-wealth, rather then with the utter destruction of the same; as knowing ful wel that no State could remainfafe, spoiled and bereft once of a publick counsel: cast about and plotted, how he might both fave the Senate, and also oblige the same to be at his and the Commons devotion. He affembled therfore the Senat one day together, and after he had protefteft with a solemn preamble, " That in no case he would like & allow of the designment and intent-" of revolting from the Romans, unless it were upon necessity and constraint : for as much as him-" felf had married the daughter of Appius Claudius, and had fair iffue by her : and befides, affianced M "a daughter of his own in marriage unto Livius in Rome: but yet (quoth he) there is a matter of "greater consequence toward, and a danger like to burst outmore to be seared then that. For the "Commons intend not by way of tevolt and rebellion to rid the City of the Senators authority, et but are purposed to massacre all the Senators, and so to deliver unto Annibal and the Carthagi-"nians, the Common-wealth, clearly void of a Senat, Of which imminent peril (quoth he) I know "how to free you, in case you will wholly trust and rely upon me, and forget all former jars, and " old debates, which have fallen out in governance and managing of the Senat. Now when all of them in place, for fear were forced to put themselves into his hands: I will, quoth he) shut ec you up within the Councel-Chamber, and pretend unto them, as though I were one of their " complices, both privy and party to this intended practife of theirs: and so by soothing them up, w "under a colourable approbation and allowance of their defignments, which I should in vain "cross and gain-say, I shall find out a ready way to save all your lives. And for assurance here-"of, ask and have of me what bond and fecurity ye will your felves. Thus having made his faithful promife to be fast and true unto them, he went forth, and commanded the Councel-House dores to be shut sure, and lest warders to keep the gate and entry thereof, that no man without his license and commandment, should either enter in, or come forth. Then after hehad called all the people together to an audience, in a folemn and frequent affembly, thus he spake unto them. "That which ye have often wished for (O ye Campans, my good neighbors and Colevius to the "ked and curfed Senat, now lieth inyour hands to perform with fafety at your pleafure. And yea Commons of "need not by way of an uproar to affault their houses one after another, to the great danger and

"But see that ye do nothing hastily upon headwithout pause, nor rashly without, advisement. I "will so compass and bring about, that ye shall give your doom of life and death upon every one " of them, to the end that each one may have his defert, and fuffer due punishment accordingly.

The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius. "But above all things ye must have an eye and look to this, that ye proceed not too much in "heat and choler: but that ye have more regard of your own fafety and profit Luan of ice and re-"venge. For (Itake it) they be these Senators only whose persons ye hate and detest; and your "meaning is not wholly to put down and overthrow the Senate quite: for either ye must a cope " of a King (O government abhominable) or elie admit a Senat, the only Council indeed of a true "City and State: and therefore with one blush (as they lay) ye are to go frop two gaps, and to do "both at once namely to abolish and depose the old Senat, and to elect a new, I win command "that the Senators shall be pited by name one after another : and concerning their ife and death, "I will demand your opinion and resolute sentence; and look what judgement ye give, that i ture-B "I ftand and be put in execution. But before the condemned guitry perion be done to death, ye is thall inhititute in his room a new Senator, tome good man of valour and contage, and worthy "to succeed in his place. With that, he sate him down. And after all their names were thrown into a lottery pitcher and huffled together, he caused him to be cited and called aloud by name, and the man himself to be brought forth of the council-House whole name chan ed to be drawn out first. He was no loonernamed, but every mancried out that he was a lewd and wicked perfon, and worthy to be hanged. Then Pacavins faid, I ice (quoti he) what defining we prefage this man. Rejected he is, and cast out for naught and unjust : choose now a good Senator, and a righteous in his room. At the first, all was filent, and as still as midnight, for default of hiding a better to place in his stead. A terwards, when some odde groom past all shame and reverence seemed to nominate one: by and by they grew to much louder words, and greater lamor: while fome laid flatly they knew not the man, others laid to his charge fundry lewd and naughty vi. es and obje-Ated against him either abject baseness, poverty and beggery or the some dishonest kind of trade and occupation, whereby he lived. Thus fared they, and much worfe a great deal when a lecond or third Senator was named: fo as it was well feen, that the men bethought themselves and repented of that they had done already, confidering how they failed fill and we eto seek, when they should substitute another in his place: for a much as it booted not, but was absurd to nominate the same again, once that their nomination gained them nothing but either to hear their vices deciphered, or to beer reproachful terms: and as for all the rest they were far more the and oblcure persons, than those that came first into their remembrane and were soones thought upon. So the people fell at length, and gently came down to this point, and confessed, that sinch better was bad they knew, than bad they knew not; and. Seldom came the better: within the old Senators to be let out of ward and enlarged. By this policy Pacurous having bound the Senate to himlest, more than to the Commons, and even as much as their life was we that without force of arms ruled the roft, and was at his devotion and command. Hereupon the ferritors laid afide the remembrance of their own dignity port, and liberty, became attable to the Commons, and would falute them kindly: inviting them ourteoully, and entertaining them liberary at their boords, with exquisite and delicate fare : undertaking and maintaining all their forces and causes: ready at all times to assist them and stand by them: and in one word emp nealing Juries (to go upon all causes and matters in law) of those whom they knew to be gracious and popular, p and fitter to win and procure the favour and affection of the ommoniott. Thus at the Councel-

This Capua was a City ever given to dissolute life and excets in pleasure, as well by reason of the natural corruption and infet disposition of the Inhabitants, as also for the plenteous & flowing abundance of all delights, and the alluring inticements of all dainties, that either fea or land might affoord, But at that time (fuch was the obsequious fawning and flattery of the Nobles such was the licentious living of the Commons) they were to lavish, that they exceeded in lust and superfluity beyond measure, and laid it on in expense without flay. Befides their contempt of Laws Magistrates, and Senate, they grew to this pais after the overthrow at Carna, that whereas before, they had some awfull and reverend regard of the Romans now they de pised and let naught p by the government and Empire of Rome. And nothing elie flood in the way, but that prefently they would have rejected their rule, and shaken off the yoak of obedience and allegeance, saving only this, That by reason of ancient entercourse of cross and mutuall marriages, many noble houles and mighty families were linked and allied to the Romans: and again, which was the greatest bond of all, whereas there had ferred in the Roman wars, certain of them: there were three hundred men of arms, and those of noblest birth of all the Campans, choice out of them and sent by the Romans to be refiant in fundry garrifons of the Cities of Sicily: whole fathers and kinsfolk (with much ado) obtained, that Embassadors should be sent unto the Consul of Rome. They found the Conulat Venusia with a few souldiers and those armed by the halves (for as yet he was Mot gone to Canusam) being in that poortaking and hard plight, as he could not be in worse; either to move pitty in the hearts of true and well affected allies or to breed contempt in proud and hallow-hearted friends, such as these Campans were. Contemptible was their case, but the Cos. made himself and his condition more despited, by bewraying too much his present distresses, and laying open to the world the nakedness of his calamity. For when the Embassadors delivered unto him, That the Senate and people of Capua took it to the heart, and greatly grieved at the adweste overthrow of the Romans, and promited therewith, to furnish him with all things fit and the Cation meet for mear; "Ye have (quoth be) O Campans, observed an order and custome, and for form and Embassians fashion visited us your confederats, in willing us to require at your hands all supplements of war; of Capua.

For what have we w "left us at all, after this discomfiture of Canna, that we should be willing to have that supplied "by our allies which is wanting? As who would fay, we had fomewhat already. Should we de-"mand of you footmen, as though we were furnished with horse is Should we say that we lark. "ed money, as if money only were wanting, and nothing elfe? No, no, Fortune hath deale to "hardly with us, that the hath left us just nothing, nor to much as that, which might be made " up and supplied by others. Our Legions of footmen, our Cornets of horse, our armor and muni-"tion, our Standards and Enfigns, horse and man, money and victuals, all is gone, loft, and peri-"fhed; either in the battell, or the morrow after in the ruin of our Camp, when we were turned "out of our tents and pavilions. And therfore ye are not, O Campans, to aid and help up in this "war; but in our behalf, and for us, yeought to take the whole charge of the war upon your "own selves, against the Carthaginians. Call to remembrance how in time past, when your an-"ceftors and forefathers were tearfully driven to keep within your walls, standing in dread and bodily fear, not of the Samnits only your enemies, but also of the Sidicins: we took them into our protection, and defended them before Satricula: and how for your sakes we began war with the Samnits, and maintained the same for the space of an hundred years, and in great variety of fortune giving and taking fundry foils all the whiles. Over and befides, call to mind. "how we concluded an indifferent and equall league with you, to the disadvantage of neither "parts: how we granted unto you the liberty of living under our own laws: and how at the "last (a matter, I wot, of right great importance and consequence, before this our late over-"throw at Canna") we granted unto a great part of you, the freedom and priviledge of Burgel-"fie and parced with you the franchiles of our own City. And therefore ye ought of right f my "Mafters of Capua) to repute this lots and misfortune now received, to be as well yours as ours: and to make reckoning to defend the common state and country of both. It is neither Samnit "nor Tulcan that we have to deal with, to whom, if we lost and parted with our Empire, yet it "remained fill within the compais of Italy: but the enemy that purineth us, is a Carthaginian, "drawing after him a train of fouldiers, who are not to much as born in Affrick, but coming "from the farthest and most remote parts and bounds of the world, from as far as the " streights " of the Ocean fea even from Hercules his pillars : void of the knowledge of all law right, and dif-"terence of condition, without reason and discretion, and (in manner) without commerce of mans language. These solders so fierce and fell by nature, so cruell and merciles by use and cu-L "flome, their captain bath withall made more wild and lavage, by making bridges, causeys, and "high-waies, over heaps of dead mens bodies: and (which I abhor to speak, by teaching them. "to eat men flesh. To see and endure these men to be their LL. whom feeding as they do upon "fuch execrable meats and viands, which even to touch and handle without great horror we "may not: to relort for justice as far as into Affrick and Carthage, and to suffer Italy to be re-"duced into a Province under the Numidians and Moors, what is he that would not detelt and "abhor, were he but born only within Italy? A worthy honour and immortall glory it will be " for you, O ye Campans, if the Roman Empire and dominion, thus growing to ruin and falling "down profirate under the weight of this late overthrow, might by your fidelity and forcible "power be staid and upheld, and set upright again. I suppose ye have levied and enrolled alrea-M "dy thirry thousand foot and four thousand horse, out of Campain: for coin, for corn, ye have "fore and plenty: Now it your faith and truth be answerable to your wealth and fortune, nei-"ther shall Annibal find that he hath won the victory, nor the Romans feel that they have lost "a journey. With this Oration thus ended, the Conful gave the Embaffadors their discharge, and dismissed them. As they returned homeward, one of them, Sabias Virius by name, faid thus unto his fellows. "Now is the day come (quoth he) wherein the Campans may be able, ec not only to recover again the lands which in times patt the Romans have wrongfully taken "from them, but also obtain & enjoy the soveraign rule & Empire of Italy. As for Annibal, we "may conclude, covenant, and capitulat with him what articles and conditions we lift our felves, to our best behoof and benefit: And it is all to nothing, that Annibal, having now dispatched N "and finished the war, will of his own accord depart like a Conquerour into Affrick, and with-"draw his forces out of these parts: so as the dominion of Italy shall be left wholly to the peo-"ple of Capita. Virias had no fooner delivered thele speeches, but they all applauded him and accorded thereto. And in such terms they related their Embaffage, as all men thought no less but the Roman Empire and name was utterly perished and extinct for ever. Incontinently the Commons and the greatest part of the Nobility of Capua enclined to revolt and rebell: Yet by the countenance and authority of the Ancients and Elders the matter was staid and deferred for some few daies. At length, the greater part prevailed, whole opinion was, That the same Embaffidors which were lent to the Roman Conful, should be addressed in embaffic unto Anni-bal, But I find in some Annal-records, that before they went, and before their resolute determined nation to revolt, there was an Embassagesent from the Capuans to the City of Rome, demanding thus much, That if they meant to have any help and aid from them, one of their Confuls migh be a Capuan. Whereat the Senat of Rome took fuch fouff and indignation, that the faid Embaffadors were commanded to void the Council-House, and a Serjeant sent after them at their heels, to set them out of the City: charging them at their perill, to take up their lodging that night without the territories of Rome. But because this demand jumpeth too near to the like that the

A Latines made long before: and both Celimand other Historians have (not without good reason) passed it over and laid nothing thereof, I dare not avow it for a reuth. Well, Embassadors there came unto Annibal, and concluded peace with him underthele conditions, and covenants: Imprimis. That no General Captain, or Magistrate of the Carthaginians should have any jurisdiction or power over a Citizen of Capua: Item, That no Citizen of Capua should be compelled against his will to serve in any wars, or execute the charge and office of a souldier. Item. That the Campans Hillenjoy their old Laws and Magistrates of their own: Item, That Annibal deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman Captives, such as they themselves shall choose; whom they might courie and exchange for their three hundred horfemen of the Campans that were in Regarrison and served for pay in Sicily. These were the Articles of the accord. But the Campans stuck not to do more than fo, and to go farther than their capitulations: committing divers and fundry outrages. For the Commons juddenly at once apprehended all the Roman Captives over the confederate fouldiers, yea, and attached other Citizens of Rome, that were either employed in any military charge, or otherwise occupied in their private affairs: and caused them to be clapt up within the floves and hot houses, as in ward and late custody, where their breath being stuffed and stopped up with exceeding heat, and steaming vapours, they were stifled, and died miserably. But there was one Decins Magins, a man who wanted no means of loveraign authority, but onlythelobriety, discretion, and wisdom of the Citizens with whom he lived; who withstood all that ever he could such enormous and audacious courses, and endeavoured to hinder the Embaffage fent to Annibal. And fo foon as he heard that Annibal was fending a garrison, he reconnted unto his fellow Citizens the proud and lordly rule of Prophus, the milerable and wetched thraldom of the Tarentines, as precedents sufficient to give them warning. He ceased not to cry aloud in open-place and audience, first, that they should not receive the garrison into the City: then, that being admitted they should either be thrust our again; or rather if they would explate and make amends by some valiant and memorable act for that shamefull leud part of theirs in revolting fo from their most ancient Allies, yea, and kinsmen by bloud, they should fall upon the Cartnaginian garrifon, and kill them every one, and so reconcile themselves again to the Romans. Annil at having intelligence of these plots (for they were not a forging and contriving in a corner)first fent certain messengers to summon Magins to repair unto his presence within his Camp. After that, feeing he stoutly denied to go, (for he pleaded that Annibal had no authority nor right to command a Citizen of Capua) he waxed wroth, and commanded the man to be apprehended, and to be haled perforce bound unto him. But fearing, upon better advice, left by offering such violence some tumult mightarise, and in the hear of bloud break forth into an inconsiderate fray, he dispatched beforehand a messenger of purpose unto Marius Blossus, the Prator or L. Governor of Capua: fignifying, that the morrow next following he would be perfonally in Capua: and so with a small guard about him, he set forth of his Camp, and put himself on his journey. Marius affembled the people together, making proclamation, and warning them to be ready in all frequent folemnity, with their wives and children, to meet Annibal upon the way. They of the adverse side unto Magius and the Romans performed this not only E obediently, but also most effectually, and with great diligence and endeavour. Yea, the common fort likewise were very forward in this action, as defirous especially to see this great General and brave warrior, so noble and renowned for his many victories. Decius Magins neither wentforth to meet him, nor yet kept his house, because he would not seem to sear and carry a guilty conscience: but walked up and down idly for his pleasure in the Market place with one of his sons and a few of his vaffals and followers, whiles the whole City-befides was bufily occupied, and much troubled in the entertaining and beholding of this great Captain and Commander of the Carthaginians: Annibal being entred the City, incontinently required to have audience in their Council-House. Whereupon, the Nobles and principall Citizens of Capua requested him that he would not that day intend any weighty matters of importance, but himself in perion solemr nizeit with joy and mixth, as an high and feastivall holiday for his welcome thither. And albeit he was by nature hafty, and ready to fall into fits of anger, yet because he would not seem at his first coming to deny them any thing, he employed a good part of that day in seeing and viewing the City. Entertained and lodged he was and his whole train with the Manii, Celeres, Stenius, and Pacuvius, the most noble and honourable personages, and the wealthiest of all others. Thither unto him, Pacuvius Calavius (concerning whom I spake before, the principal man of that bend and faction, which reduced the City to the obedience and devotion of Annibal) brought his ownfon a young Gentleman, and faid withall, that the youth kept continually with Decius, and that he was fainto plack him away from his company and train, whose part he took, and fluck most fliffly to him; in maintaining the old society and amity of the Romans, against G the new League with the Carthaginians; and neither the bending and inclination of the whole City to the contrary fide, nor yet the reverent majefly of a father, had yet driven him from his oblinate resolution. And for that time the father laboured with Annibal rather by way of prayer and intreaty, than by excusing and clearing his son, that he would not be discontented nor displeased with the young man. So he was overcome with the importunate request and plentifull teares of the father, and gave commandment, that he together with his father should be bidden to supper, at which feast he purposed to have the company of no other guests of all Capua, but only of his hostels that have him entertainment, and one Jubellius Taurea, a famous and brave warrior. To hopper they were long before day-light went down, and fared at H the table not after the guile of Carthaginians not according to the discipline of fouldiers but afrer the order of a City and house, which had been used a long time to have the board furnished with fundry forts of dainty dishes, and with all delicate junkets to please the palate and table Perolls only the fon of Calavius could not be brought to change his mind and thew himfelf cheerful and merry at meat, not withflanding the Mafters of the tealt, and sinnbal himself other whiles invited him to bear them company, and he with them; but he ever made his excuse to his father, the he was ill at ease and fickly when loever he seemed to examine him and to know the cause of such wonderful trouble of mind, and vexation of spirit, So;a little afore sun-setting, when his father arole, and was gone out from supper, he followed hard after him : and when they were come into. a fecret place apart, (a garden it was on the back fide of the house). I will tell you a thing father I have in my head a policy, and a ready mean, how we shall not only obtain pardon at the Romans hands for our trespass committed, infalling away from them, and turning to Annibal; bur "also how we Campans may be in far greater elemation and favour among them than ever we " were. The father marvelling hereat, was defirous to know what device that might be; and with "that the youth cast his gown from off his shoulders, and shewed him a good blade girded to "his fide. I will quoth he, out of hand, establish and seal fure the Roman League with the blond " of Annibal I was defirous (father) to let you know of it aforehand, if peradventure you would . be willing to be out of the way when the deed is a doing. The old man feeing and hearing this. in a great fearfull agony, as if he had been present to see the execution of that which he heard k him to freak of, " Now I beieech thee, my ion (quoth he) and pray thee of all loves and bonds " rhar bind children and parents together, that thou wilt not before thy fathers face either com-"mit or suffer this so horrible a part full of all abominable wickedness what soever, and not to be "named. There are not many hours finite, that we ware by all the gods and holy hallows in hea-" ven, and by joyning hand in hand, made faithful promite, and obliged our felves to communist cate together with him, and to eat at the holy table of facred riands. And are we no fooner "departed alunder from our familiar conference and parley, but we arm our felves against him? "Arifest thou indeed from thy friends guest-boord, to which thou wert thy self a third man bid-"den of all the Campans, and even by Annibal, and will thou flain and pollute that boord with "the bloud of the principal guest? Suffer therefore thy felf here to be frighted from this thy intended mitchief, "before thou have the foil there, and mils of thy purpole. With that, he marked his fon to weep and shed tears, and embracing him about the middle, and killing him ever and anon, he left him not, nor gave over to pray & entreat him instantly unrillhe got at his hands to lay off his sword, and promife him faithfully, that he would not attempt any such enterprise. Then the youth, seeing how M the case stood, "I will (quoth he) pay unto my natural father that kindness and love, in which "I am bound as a debtor to my native Country. But alas for you, good father, I am right forry "for your hard hap; who are to answer before God and the world, for the betraying of your "country no fewer times than thrice already. Once, when you gave countell and perfwaded to forfake the Romans, and to revolt from them: again, when you were the principall agent, and "advised to make peace with Annibal: and now this day the third time, when you are the only "obstacle and hinderance that Capua is not restored again into the hands of the Romans. O " fweet countrey and native foil of mine, take here at my hands this fword, wherewith erewhile "I was girt and armed for dear love of thee and was fully minded to defend this thy chief Caffle "and Fortreis, and not to spare, but embrue it in the bloud of thy mortall enemy : take it I say; O " fince my own father is ready to wrest it from me. This said, he flung his sword over the garden wall into the high way and open freet; and therewith, because he would not grow into any fuspition, he shewed himself again to the guells within the house, and took part of the banquet. The morrow after, the Senate in favour of Annibal folemnly met together in great number: in which frequent affembly, the beginning of his speech was very pleasant and gracious: wherein hegave the Capuans thanks, for preferring his amity before the alliance of the people of Rome: and among other fair and magnificall behefts to them made, he promited that within a while,

A Cama should be the head City and chief State of all Italy, whereunto the people of Rome, together with other nations, should refort for law and justice." Mary, quoth he there is one that hath " no part or fellowship in the society and league made between the Carthaginians and you, name-"Iv. Magins Decini, who neither was a Campan nor ought of right to be to called and reputed: "him I demand to be delivered into my hands, and that in my presence the Senate should be as-"ked their opinion concerning his trespass, and an Act presently entred thereof. All of them there affembled allowed of the motion, and gave their affent in the end : albeit a great fort of them thought both the man unworthy of that hard fortune and calamity, and that this was but an ill beginning and a very overture to the infringing of the right of their freedom. The chief Ma-Beiftrate then went forth of the Council-Chamber, and late in the Judiciall Hall or Temple, and commanded Decius to be attached, and to fland before him at his feet, and there to answer for himself and make his defence. Who perfisted still in the same stoutness and boldness of spirit, alledging that by vertue of the covenants in the League comprised, he might not lawfully be preffed and forced thus far. Whereupon he had irons clapt upon him, and commandment was given that he should have a Lictor attend upon him, and to be conveighed into the Camp of Annital. All the way as he was led, folong as he was bare-headed and open-faced, he went preaching to the multitude that flocked about him, and with a loud voice spake and faid : " Now Capuans, ve have "the liberty that we fought and longed for. In the open market place, at noon-day, and in your "fight, lo how I, a man inferior to none in all Capua, am led away bound in chains to die. Go forth, go and meet Annibal adorn and hang the City with rich cloath of tapiffry, Register in your Kalender, "among other holidaies, this day of his Entry, that in the end ye may behold this goodly triumph " over one of your own Citizens. Upon the utterance of these words, the multitude seemed discontented at the indignity of this fight. Whereupon he was hoodwinked, and his head covered, and the Serjeant was charged to have him away quickly, and makehaste out of the gates, So, he was brought into the Camp, and immediatly shipped and sent to Carthage, for tear lest some commotion might arise in Capua, upon so unworthy and shamefull a deed: and lest the Senat alto should repent themselves, that they had delivered and yielded out of their hands a principal personage among them: also to prevent that no Embassage might be sent unto him for his redelin very, whereby he should either offend his new Allies, in case he denied them their first request of fuffer Capua to have alwaies a busie and seditious Citizen ready ever to stir up new troubles if he granted their fuit. The ship wherein he was embarked, was by a tempest cast upon Cyrena, a port town in the dominion at that time of the KK. There, Magius fled for refuge as to a Sanctuary, unto the Image of King Ptolomaus, and was brought by his guard and keepers unto Alexandria to the Kings presence, and enformed the King, how contrary to the tenorand priviledge of the covenant he was in bonds by Annibal. Whereupon he was loofed from his chains, and put to the choice. whether he would return to Capua, or go to Rome. Magins answered, that he could not in Capua remain in safety, and if he went to Rome, at that time especially when there was war between the Romans and the Capuans, he should be sooner lodged there in a prison like a sugitive runnagate, E than entertained in house for a friend and loving guest: and concluded in the end, that he would make abode and live the rest of his daies more willingly in no place of the world, than in his highness Realm whom he found already to be the saviour of his life, and the redeemer of his liberty While these occurrents fell out abroad, Q. Fabius Pictor, sent (as is abovefaid) Embassador to Delphos, returned to Rome, and out of a writing he read openly, the answer of the Oracle in their words (now ye must understand, that in this Script were certain gods and faints named, unto whom they should make solemn supplication, and the manner also with all ceremonies and complements thereto belonging:) " Then (O Romans) if ye shall so do, your state shall prosper and be "more happy: your Common-weal shall go forward better to your mind yea, and victory in the F" wars shall happen unto the people of Rome, But remember that when all things shall go well on "your fide; and your State shall be faved and preferred, ye fend unto Pythias Apollo a present, ac-"cording to the merit of a due recompence; and of the filver railed of the pillage, prizes, and "fpoilstaken from the enemies, do him honour accordingly. After he had reheated thele words, truly, translated out of the Greek Original then he faid moreover, That io foon as he was departedfrom the Oracle, he presently facrificed unto all those gods with frankincense and wine. Also, that he was commanded by the Priest of Apollo, that like as he both came to the Oracle, and also celebrated facrifices, crowned with a garland and chaplet of Laurel, to he should in the same manner adorned take thip and be imbarked, and not lay off the faid garland before he was arrived to Rome. Finally, that all ceremonies performed most precisely and diligently, which he was com-G manded to observe, he had laid and bestowed the said chapter upon the alter, before the Shrine of Apollo at Rome. Then the Senare made a decree, That those faerifices and supplications should with all speed and carefull regard be celebrated.

Whiles these things passed at Rome and in Italy, Mago the son of Amilear, arrived at Carthage and brought the first tidings of the victory at Canra. This Mago was not immediatly and directly fent from his brother, out of the field where the battel was fought, but flaid certain daies about receiving the homage and subjection of certain Cities of the Bratis, which revolted from the Romans. Who having audience given him in the Senat of Carthage, related what acts and exploits his brother Annibal had atchieved in Italy: namely, That he had given battell to H fix Generals, whereof four were Confuls, and two were the Dictator and Commander of horses men: That he had fought against fix entire Consular armies, in which battels he had slain above 200000 enemies, taken priloners more than 50000. That of thotefour Coff, he had killed twain outright : as for the other two one of them was deadly hurt, the other having loft his wholearmy, was fled accompanied scarcely with fifty men : that the General of the Cavalry created with ful Confusar authority, was discomfitted and put to flight and the Dictator (fortooth) because he never would hazard the fortune of a field, was counted the only warrior and worthy Captain: That the Brutii and Apulians part of the Samnits, and Lucans, were revolted to the Carthaginians: That Capsa, the head City not of Campan only, but fafter the Romans defeat and overthrow I in the battell at Canna) of ail Italy also, was furrendred to Annibal. For these to many and to worthy victories, he required (meetand require it was) that thereshould be a solemn lettivall day holden and facrifices tolemnized to the honour of the immortal gods. And for the better affurance of their lucky and fortunate archievements, and to verifie his words, he caused the gold rings of the Romans, flain at Canna, to be poured forth in the porch and entry of the Council-House. The heap of them was to great, that as some authors affirm, when they measured the same, they filled three Modif and an half. But the constant report went, and founding neerer to a truth, that they were not above one Modius. He added moreover, and faid, (and all to prove their overthrow the greater) that none but knights and men of arms, and those of the better fort, who served on horses found at the Cities charges, used to wear that ornament. The drift and conclusion of his K speech was this, " I hat the sooner that Annibal hoped to make an end of the wars, the more he "ought to be aided and helped with all provision and furniture accordingly. And why? Theser-"vice was far from home, in the midft of the enemies land, a huge deal of corn was confirmed, a " great mass of money was spent; and as so many battels had utterly swoopt up the enemies ar-"mies, to reckning was to be made, that they had in tome measure lessened and impaired the for-"ces of the conquerour. Therefore, a new supply of men was to be sent over, and money for soul-"diers pay, yea, and corn also was to be transported to so mave souldiers, that had done so fingu-"lar good fervice, and deserved to well of the Carthaginian nation. Upon these reports of Mago, "when all men elle were wondrous glad, and took great contentment, Himileo, a man of the "Brachin bend, supposing he had now good occasion and opportunity offered to carp and check t "Hanno, How now Hanno quoth he, what fay you to this gear ? Repent you ftill and mislike the "war undertaken against the Romans? Let us see now, give your voice and opinion that Annibal " be yielded: forbid now thankigiving to be performed to the immortall gods for this profperous " speed and fortunate incess. Let us hear a Roman Senator now to speak in the Council-House of the Carthaginians. Then Hannoo; "I would have held my peace this day, my LL, quoth he, "for feart o freak ought that in this common and generall joy might not be altogether pleafant "unto you. But now, seeing a Senator bluntly spurreth me the question, whether I mislike still of "the enterprise of war against the Romans? if I should keep silence and say nothing. I might "Geem either proud and infolent, or elie faulty and culpable. Whereof the one is the part of a man "that hath forgot the liberty of other men; the other a property of him, that thinketh not of w his own. Well may I therefore answer to Himileo, that I cease not yet to mislike this war, nor "never will give over to blame and challenge this invincible Captain and warrior of ours, be-" fore I see the war ended and determined, upon some indifferent hand, and tollerable conditi-"on and nothing elle shall thint the mils I have, and quench the longing defire of the old peace, "but the making of a new, And therefore these particulars, which M. go erewhile so magnified "and vaunted of are for the prefent joyfull news to Himileo, and other of that crue, and the fup-" posts of Annibal: and to me likewise in some measure, they may be acceptable tidings, in this refroard that good success and lucky speed in war, if we will make the right use and benefit of our "fortune, will be a mean to procure us a more easie and honourable peace. For if we let slip this "advantage and opportunity of the time, when as we may feem rather to give than take condi-N "tions of peace, I fear me, that even this prefent fo goodly a shew of rankness as it maketh now, " will run up all to fraw, and bear no head to yield corn in the end. And yet let us confider now, "what a special matter this is Slain I have whole armies of enemies. Therfore send me fresh and "new fouldiers. What could you (Sir) demand more, if you had been overthrown? Won I have "by force two strong holds where the enemies were encamped, full and traight (we wust needs "think) of prizes and victuals; Allow me more corn and money. What would you have requi-"red and craved more, a fay, in case you had been rifled, and turned perforce out of your own "Camp and pavilions? But that I may not marvel alone at these strange Enthymemes and conclu-" fions (for it is as free and lawfull for me to ask fome queftions, feeing. I have already answered to "Himilea) I would fain have Himileo or Mago, I care not whether, to make answer likewileto O me. Say, that in the battell before Canna, the Roman Empire was wholly defeated and foiled. "Say also, that certain it is, how all Italy is at point ready to revolt tell me first and formost, whe-"ther any one Nation of the Latine people is faln from them to us? Secondly, whether any one or person of the five and thirty wards in Rome, is run away, and fled to Annibal? When Mago said "nay, and denied both. Why then (quoth he) there be great numbers of our enemy fill behind. "But I would gladly know what courage, what heart, what hopes, that multitude hath. When "Mago answered he could not tell. And nothing (quoth Hanno) is more rife & easie to be known.

A Gay man, lent the Romans any Embaffadors to Annibal to treat for peace? Nay, had ye any intelligen e brought unto you, that there was so much as one word litped, or mention made at " Rome of peace? When Mago faid flatly nay, to that too, Why then (quoth Hanno) by this ac-"Count this war will find us work, and keep us occupied as much as it did the very hill day that "Annil allet foot in Italy. How variable fortune was in the former Punick war, how victory went and came resiprocally, we are most of us yet alive that well remember. We never sped bet-"ter nor had a luckier hand, both by land and fea, than before Caim Last atim, and Aulus Pesthu-"mus were Confuls. And whiles Lutturius and Post humius were Confuls, were we vanquished B" and utterly overthrown before the Islands Agates, And incase now (which God forbid) for-" tune should chan, e to change and turn her wheel, hope ye to have peace then, being overcome. "which now when we are conquerors, no man offreth nor leeketh after. For mine own parts if any man should ask mine opinion of peace, either to present and tender it to the enemies, "orto accept it at their hands, I wot well what to fay : but if ye would know what I think conescerning those demands of Mago, my advice is, that there is no sence nor reason to send aid and 6 supplies to conquerors now if they bear us in hand, delude, and abuse us with a vain and faise e perswanon of conquest and victory, much less a great deal. These remonstrances of H. nno took imali effect with many of them: for, both the fecret grudge and ran or which he bare to the Bar-hin House, much impeached his credit and authority, and also by reason that their minds C were to fully possessed of the present joy, they could admit and abide to hear of nothing, that might found otherwise to daunt their glad hearts; thinking verily that the war would foon be ar an end i they now would fir ain a little and help it forward. And therefore with great confent. there passed an Act of the Senat, That there should be a supply sent unto Annibal of forty thoufand Numidians, forty Elephants, and many talents of filver. Also the Disator was sent before with Mago into Spain, to leavy and hire twenty thousand footmen, and four thousand horsemen for to make up those broken armies which were in Italy and in Spain. But these matters (as mually it hapneth in time of prosperity) were performed but slackly and at leiture. The Romans contrariwite made more speed, as being by nature more industrious: and bendes, such was their adverte fortune and extremity, that they might not neglect their affairs and go flowly about n their bufiness. For neither the Conful was wanting in any affairs that were by him to be managed and the Dictator M. Jun. Brutus, fo foon as he had performed all the complements concercerning facrifices and religious ceremonies, proposed unto the people, That (as the usuall manner was) he might mount on horieback. Which done, over and befides the two legions of Citizens, which in the beginning of the year had been levied and enrolled by the Confuls, and the bondslaves that were before mustred, and certain squadrons gathered together out of the Picene and Gauls country, he proceeded to the last remedy and succour of a distressed and well near desperstestate, when as honest and direct courses must give place unto commodious and profitable policies, and alight from his horie, and made proclamation, That who foever were guilt y and condemned of any capital crime, or who foever were imprisoned for debt, and would willingly ferve Funder him, he would take order that they should be exempt from all punishment, and discharged from their creditors. And of such he armed fix thousand with the spoils of the Gauls, which in the triumph of Flaminius were carried in shew. Thus he departed from Rome five and twenty thoufand (trong. Annibal having possessed himself of Capua, and sollicited the Neupolitans once again, and founded their minds, proposing before their eyes fear and hope, and all in vain, led his forces into the Country of Nola, with this mind, not at first to go roughly with them to work, and by way of open hostility, because he was not out of all hope, that they would willingly come off and yield themselves: but in case they wavered, and answered not his hope and expectation in some good time, he would furely proceed against them in all extremity, and put them to what oever they could endure or fear. The Senate, and especially the principall of them, continued fast and fure in their alliance with the people of Rome: But the commons (astheir manner is, defirons of alteration and to see a new world) enclined wholly to the side of Annibal, casting many doubts. and fears, that their lands and possessions should be wasted and spoiled with sundry calamities and indignities that follow upon fiege: neither wanted there heads and ring-leaders of a rebellion. Whereupon the Senate (for fear left if they should feem to thwart and cross them, they had not been able to withtland the violence of the multitude once up and drawn to an head closely diffembled their intent and purpose, and so by temporizing, prevented a present mitchief. For they made semblance that they liked well, and were resolved of revolting unto Annib 1: but upon what conditions and capitulations they should enter into new league and amity, they knew not certainly. So having taken a farther time they dispatched in haste certain Embassadors Gunto the Roman Prator Maycellus Claudius, who remained with the army at Canafium, advertifing him in how great jeopardy the state of Nolastood, to wit. That Annibal was already Lord of their ands, and the Carthaginians would foon be mafters of the City unless they were fucconred and relieved: that their Senat were driven to this shift. for to yield unto the Commons, and grant to revo't when oever they would have them, and by that means flaid them that they rebelled not over haltily. Marcellus after he had commended the Nolans, willed them with the fame diffimulation to protract time and hold off untill his coming: and in the mean while to conceal and keep secret to themselves, the dealings and treaties with him, and in no case to be known of any hopethey had of aid from the Romans. Himself went fron Canufium, to Calatia, H and from thence passed over the river Vulsarnus, and by the way of Satricula and Tretia, journeyed over Sneffula through the mountains and arrived at Nola. A little before the coming of the Roman Prator, Annibal was departed and gone out of the Territory of Nola, and drew downwards to the fea-fide near unto Neap-lis: his teeth watered at the Port-town, and that out of Affrick his ships might arrive thither, as to a sase and sure harbour. But after that he heard that N ples was held by a Roman Provoit, M. Junius Syllanus (fent for thither by the Neapolitans themselves) and had received a garrilon: seeing he could not be admitted into Neapolis, no more than into Nola he went to Nuceria. Having beleasured it round a long time and often affaulted it forcibly and affajed to follicit as well the Commons as the Nobility, but without effect; at the t length by famine he forced them to yield, and to became mafter of the Town upon composition. That they should depart every man disarmed in their single garments. Then, as one that would teem ever from the beginning, to useclemency to all Italians, but only the Romans; he made fair promites of great rewards and advancement to honour, unto all those that would tarrybehind and ferve under him. But no manupon those hopes would remain with him. For they all gave him the flip, and went fundry waies, fome to their friends and acquaintance, others at a venture as their mind flood to divers Cities of Campain, but most to Nola and Naples. Amongst the reft, there were almost thirty Senators, and those (as it fell out) of the best fort, that came to Capua: but being kept out there because they had shut their gates against Annibal, they went to Cumes. The pillage of Nuceria was bellowed upon the fouldiers the City facked and burnt, K Now kept Marcellus Nola, not preluming more upon the firength of his owngarrison, than upon the confidence he had in the great men and chief of the City. But he had the Commons in realouse, and above all, one L. Bantius, who for that he had complotted to rebell, and therefore flood in fear of the Roman Deputy: one while was pricked and incited to attempt treason, and to betray his Country; another while, in case he should fail of that opportunity, and mils his purpose, to make an escape and run away to the enemy. A couragious and lufty young man he was, and the braveff Cavaleer in those daies of all the Roman Confederats. His hap was to be found lying half dead among the heaps of flain bodies before Ganna: Annibal took order for the curing of his hurts, and when he was throughly healed, right curreously sent him home well and bountifully rewarded. In remembrance of which favour and good turn, and in token of L thankfulness, he was willing to deliver and yield Nola into the hands of Annibal, to be at his devotion. But the Prator had an eye unto him, and observed how his head wrought, and was busily occupied to bring an alteration. And feeing there were but two waies to deal with him, either by punishment to keep him short, and cut him off; or by some benefit to win his heart: he thinking it a better course to gain unto himself so hardy and valiant a friend, than only to bereave his enemy of him; he tent for him, and in this manner spake friendly unto him: "You have (quoth "he)amonft your countrymen and fellow-Citizens, I fee well, many that envy you, as it appears "well by this, that there is never a neighbouryou have at Nola that hath told me of you, and "how many noble exploits and good fervices in war you have performed. But yet your valout " cannot be unknown and hidden, ever fince you ferved in the Roman army. For many there M "be which were fouldiers then with you, which have made report unto me of your prowels, and " what perils you have entred into and how often you have put your life in hazard, for the fafety "and honour of the people of Rome: and namely, how in the battel before Canna you gave not "over fight, until at length having bled well near to death, you were born to the ground and so lay under foot, overwhelmed with men, horse and armour, falling upon you, and so kept down that you could not rife up again. But be of good chear man, and go on fill in this thy vertue and "well-doing: you shall have at my hands all honour and reward that may be possible: and the "oftner you come to me and keep me company, you shall find it will be more for your reputation "and commodity both. The young man was glad at heart for these gracious words and large promiles: and so Marcellus gave unto him freely, a good brave courser, and commanded the Trea-N furer to tell him out in money * 500 * Bigats of filver, charging his officers and Lictors to let him have accels unto him at his pleafure, whenfoever he came. By this curteous usage and humanity of Marcellus, the young mans stoot heart was so dulced, mollified and easie to be wrought, that * Bigatus W12 a piece of Ro. of all Confederats and Allies there was not one, who bare himself more valiantly, nor maintained man invet cin, fo called more faithfully the State of Rome. When Annibal was approached to the gates of Nola (for he was of Bigia, a charrecurned from Naceria, and came thither again) and the Commons within the town practifed afresh to rebell, Marcellus had a little before the coming of the enemies, retired and put himself) iot drawn with two horwithin the wals: not for fear that he should not be able to keep the field and his hold; but lest tes,ftrucken or he should give advantage and opportunity to betray the City, seeing too many of them within flamped upon disposed and forward thereunto. After this, they began on both sides to arrange their battels in O the one fide. array the Romans under the wals of Nolathe Carthaginians before their own fort. Small skirand it was the fame that Demishes there were between the City and the Camp of Annibal (with variable event of fortune) begaine the Generals were not willing, either to deny and debar some few that were so eager and forward to call for fight, or yet to give forth the fignall of a generall battell. Whilesthele two armies temporized thus, and held their Corps de guard, continually, and in manner of a solemn set Assembly, the chief Nobles of the Nolans advertised Marcellus, that there used to be night-meetings and conferences between their own Commons and the Carthaginians:

A and that it was plotted and let down, That when the Roman Host was issued in battel-array out of their gates, the Commons in the mean while should fall to rifling their carriages, packs, and truffes within, and then thut the gates upon them, and keep the walls; and to having the City and all their goods and baggage under their hands, should from thenceforth receive Annal alinto the City inflead of Mercellus. Upon their advertisements, Mercellus after he had thanked and commended the Senators of Nol.1, determined before any commotion and mutiny grose within the walls to try the forture of a battel. At those three gates that flood toward the enemy he ranged his forces divided into three battaillons, & gave order that all the carriages thou d follow after: B and that the lackies, launders, and other Camp followers, together with the feeble and fickly perions, should carry stakes and pales for the rampier. At the middle gate he placed the flower and Arength of the legions, together with the Roman Cavalry; at the two gates at either hand he beflowed the new fouldiers the light armed, and the anxidary horsenen of alies. The Nolans were by fireight commandment forbidden to approach the gates or the walls. As for the baggage and carriages, the ordinary guard was appointed to attend thereupon, for tear, left while the Legions were buile in fight there should be some assault made upon them. In this order and array marshalled they were within the gates. Annil al, who likewife ready arranged, flood with banner difplaied (as he had done for certain daies together) untill it was well toward noon first wondred at it that neither the Roman army issued out of the gates nor any fouldier appeared upon the wals: C and inpposing afterwards, that their usual complots and conventicles were discovered and revea-led, and that for very lear they kept within and fat slill, sent back part of their fouldiers into the Camp, with commandment, in all speed to bring abroad into the open field before the vanguard, all the Ordnance and Attiliery for to batter the City walls; with affored confidence, that if he came hotly upon them, and gave an affault, whiles they thus lingted and iffined not forth, the Commons would make some tumult and stir within the City. But anon as every man was busing occupied, running to and fro in haste about his own charge, before the vanguard and foreiront of his battel even at the point when he advanced forward to the wals; all upon a indden a gate was fet open, and Marcellus canfed the trumpers to found the alarm, and the fou diers to fet up a shout, commanding the footmen first, and then the horieto fally out, and with all the might and p force they could, to charge upon the enemy. Soon had they terrified their main battell sufficiently, and made disorder there, when at the two gates of each side, P. V. derius Flaceus and Caius ourelius, two Lieutenants generally issued forth upon their stanks and wings. The horse-boies, scullions and the other multitude above aid, which was fet to guard the carriages, arole up and made a new outery, and shouted, so as to the Carthaginians (who contemned them before for their small number especially) they represented all at once a shew of a mighty army. I dare not avouch that which some Authors slick not to write, that of enemies were slain in this conflict 2:00 and that the Romans loft but one only man. But what vistory foever it was, either to great or imaller, furely a doughty piece of service was that day atchieved & I wot not whether I may truly fay, of the greatest consequence that any ever was during the time of that war For as the time was then, it was a greater matter for the Romans (albeit they were the Conquerors) not to be Evanquished of Annibal than it was afterwards to vanquish him Annibal disappointed of his hope to win Nola retired to Acorre, And Marcellus immediately having that the gates, and placed the guards and warders to keep the same, that no man might go forth, sat judicially in the marketplace to examine those that had used secret conference and parling with the enemies : and finding above seventy guilty of this action, pronounced sentence of death upon them, as in case of treafon. Those he cut shorter by the head, and commanded their goods to be conficat. And thus leaving the government of the City to the Senat thereof, he departed with all his forces, and above

Sueffula encamped himfelt and there abode. Anibil being come before Acerra, first summoned the City, to surrender voluntarily & withour constraint : but seeing them obstinate, and willing to relent, he made preparation to lay siege Funto the rown and to affault it. But the Acerrans had better heart and courage than might and ffrength to refift him. Therefore, when they taw themselves like to be intrenched all about, and were past hope to defend and keep the town: before the enemies had brought all ends of their trenches and konces together they got between the trenches and rampiers (where they were not finished, and stood not close together) in the dead time of the night, and escaped through the sentinels and watches that were flendely looked unto, and as well as they could making first through by-waies and band lanes over hedge and ditch (ascither their wits guided them, or their fear carried them) recovered those Cities of Campania, which they knew for certain were not revolted, but peristed true and fast unto the Romans. Annibalafter he had put Acerra to the fack, and fet it on fire having intelligence, that the Roman Dictator and the Legions were received at Cafili-Gnum: and fearing, left while the enemy lay so near encamped, some should have recourse also into

Capualled his army to Calilinum.

At the same time Preneste was held by 500 Prenestins, with a sew Romans and Latines, who upon the news of the overthrow at Canna, were retired thither. These Preneftins, by occasion that they were not levied and mustered at Preneste by the day appointed, set out from thence somewhat too late; and were come as far as Cafilinum, before the rumour was bruited of the defeat before Canna: where they joyned themselves with other Romans and Consederats, set forward from Castlinum, and marched together with a good great company: but meeting by the way castinum be-

with the tidings of that unfortunat field, turned back again to Casilinum. And after they had bent't certain daies there as well fearing the Campans as suspected of them again, (for they deviled on both fides how to entrap one another and how to avoid each others trains) and having received alfocertain intelligence, That in Capua there was treating about a revolt, and that Annibal was there received; they in one night let upon the Townsmen of Casilinum, and killed them, and got that part of the City which is on this tide Vulturnus (a river that sunneth through it and divideth it into two parts) and kept it fill. Their number was well encreased by the coming of a cohort of four hundred and fixty Perufins, who likewife were driven to Cafilinum, by the immereport and news, which a few daies beforehad turned the Preneftins thither. And furely there was fufficient almost of armed fouldiers to man and defend the walls of that part, being of so small acir-1 cuit as they were, confidering the town was flanked on the one fide with the river. And again. for the proportion of corn (whereof they had small flore) they were men but too many. Annihad being now not far from thence, fent before him the Getulians, under the conduct of a Captain named If dea; with direction that first, if he could come to a parley, he should perswade with the Inhabitants within, and by fair words induce them to open their gates, and receive a garrison; but in case they continued still in their obstinacy, then to asiail them by force, and give the attempt to enter into the City one way or other. When they were come under the walls, the barbarous Captain if ilea, supposing (because he heard no noise, and saw no stirring) that they had quit and abandoned the town and were fled, began to affail the gates, break open the locks, & burlt the bars. But all at once on a sudden the gates were set open, and two cohorts well appointed and provi- K ded for that purpose within, fallied forth with an exceeding great noise and tumple, overthrew a number of the enemies and beat them down. Thus when the first had the repulse and were set back, Makare I was fent with a greater power to fecond them, but was not able to make his party good with these squadrons that sallied forth and charged upon him, At last Annibal himselfencamped even before the wall, and with all his power and forces put together, made preparation to give affault to this little town & small garrison. And whiles he pressed hard upon them with fresh and hot affaults, invefting it round about, the enemies from off their wals, curtains, and turrets, let flie their floot to luftily upon the affailants that he loft fome of his best & most forward men ther. Once they iffued forth of themselves upon a bravery, and minded to bid them battel, but by a confe of Elephants, fet between them and home they had like to have been that forth and kept L out and to they made halfe in great fear to recover the gates and put themselves within the town again; having loft, confidering formall a number, a great fort; and more had died for it, but that the night parted the fray and made an end of the skirmish. The morrow after the affailants were all of them tharp fet to give a fresh and hot charge, but not before there was a murall Coronet of gold shewed, and promised unto him that first could scale the walls. And the General himselfcast in their teeth and reproved them for being so long about the assaulting of a smal and weak sconce, to speak of, seated also upon a plain: whereas before they had won the strong town of Saguntum. He put them in mind both all and some, of Canna, Thrasymenus, and Trebia. Then began they to fer mantlets and pavoifes to, and to undermine. Many and fundry enterprises were attempted, and nothing left undone, that either by meer force could be performed, or by art and cunning de-M vited. The Roman affociats against these their engins and fabricks raised mounts, and platforms: yea, and with countermines and cross trenches, met with the mines of the enemies; so as both above ground and underneath they impeached all their attempts; to long, untill Annibal for very shame was fain to give over his defign for the present. And when he had fortified his standing Comp and placed there a mean guard for the defence of it, because he would not seem to have relinouished altogether the enterprise, he withdrew himself into Capaa, there to winter. There he lodged his fouldiers within house for the better part of winter: those fouldiers. I fay, who many a time and often had endured long, and held out against all travels and hardness that can possibly happen to the body of man; and never had been used to any good keeping, nor acquainted with delights and pleasures of the world. But even these men, whom no calamity, no misery could N tame and overcome, were spoiled and undone with too much wealth and excessive dainties; and fo much the rather as they more greedily fell thereto; and having not tafted thereof before, gave theinfelves wholly that way, and were deeply plunged and drowned therein. For fleeping on fost beds, wine and delicate fare, wenching and bathing, slews and hor-houses, idleness and taking eafe, which by use and custome grew pleasant and delightsome unto them every day more than other; had in such fort weakned their bodies, and made their hearts so effeminate, that from that time forward the reputation and name only of their victories past defended them morethan any present strength and vigor they had: infomuch, as expert and skilfull warriors judged their Captain Annibal in more fault, and farther overleen in this action, than in not leading his Army ffreight forward to Rome, after the battell before Canna. For, that flay might have been 0 thought to have deferred only the entire and finall victory for a time, but this errour and overfight feemed to disable him for atchieving the victory for ever. So little retained he of his former old discipline that I assure you he went out of Capua again as if he had led some other Ar: my and none of his own. For, not only they returned from thence most of them intangled and inared in the love of harlors, but io foon as they came again to lie abroad on the bare earth under tents and pavilions covered with beafts hides, to march long journeys, and to tafte of other military toil and labour; their bodies fo tired, their hearts fo fainted, as if they had been

raw fouldiers, new come into the field: in such wife, as all the time of their summer abode in Camp, many of them withou license and pasport, would slip out of the way, and depart from their colours: and these start-backs had no other place of haunt to lurk in but Capua. Now when the winter feafon began to be more mid, and draw towards the Spring, Annibal brought forth his fouldiers out of his wintring harbours and returned to (afilinum: where, albeit the affault ceafed, ver the fiege had continued to treight, that the townimen and the garrison within the Fort. were driven to extream necessity and want of victuais. Now the Captain over the Roman Camp was T. Sempronius [Grachus] by reason that the Dictator was gone to Rome to take new Auspi-R ces. And as for Marcellus, who was denrous for his part to revieve and fuccour the befieved was impeached for coming to them partly, by the riting and (welling of the river Vulcurnus, and partly, by the intreaty of the Citizens of Nola and Acerra, who greatly feared the Campans, in cale the garrilon were once departed from them. And Graschus, lying and keeping near unto Cafilinum, flirred not one foot, by reason of the express commandment of the Dictator. That he should attempt nothing in his absence: albeit there came daily from Casilinum into the Campfuch news as would have moved and provoked the most patient manthat was. For it was constantly reported, and for certain known, that fome of them within the town, no longer able to endure the famine. threw themselves down headlong, and brake their necks: others flood unarmed upon the walls, offring their bare and naked bodies as a Butt and mark to the shot of arrows, and others dares C Gracehus grieved much to hear these pitious tidings, yet durt he not for his life, skirmish and fight without the warrant of the Diclator: & he saw full well that if he would convey corn and victuals unto them openly, fight he mult, there was no remedy. Having therefore no hope at all to fend any, but it should be spied he devised to fill many tuns and pipes with corn, that he had gotten together out of the country all about and withall, to dispatch a messenger to the chief Magistrate of Casslinum, advising him that he should in the night season take up all those vessels that came down the river. The night next following, every man watched at the river fide according to the hope they conceived by the forelaid Roman meffenger, and to received those tuns, hulling down the midst of the stream; and the corn was equally divided among them all. Thus did they the morrow after, and the third day alfo, For ever by night these vestels were let down into the water, and the p same night they might easily come unto them: by reason whereof the sentines and guards of the enemies were nothing ware of that which was done. But afterwards, the current growing more fwift and rough, by occasion of continuall rain that fell, the faid tuns were some of them driven crofs the channel to the bank fide, even where the enemies warded; and were espied waving and flicking among the willows and offers that grew along close unto the banks: whereof Annibal was advertised. And to from then reforward they tended the watch more straightly that nothing fent down the river Vulturinus could escape them, and pass to the City. Afterwards, there was powred into the water great flore of nuts from the Camp of the Romans; which floated down the channel unto Cafilinum, and with grated skimmers of wicker were taken up. But at the laft. they within the town were driven to this poor shift and extremity, for to take their thongs and Ebridle rains, to pluck of the leather from their shields & bucklers, and make them soft in falding water, and prove how they could eat them. Nay, they spared not so much as mice, and rats, nor any other like vermin. Nor there was not a weed nor a root that they could come by upon the banks and terraces under the wails, but they gathered and digged up. And when the enemies had turned up with a ploughall the green-ford of the counter-scarp without the walls, they within cast turmip-feed upon the mould. Whereupon Annibal made a hout at it, and cried aloud: What? shall we fit here about Cafilinum fo long, untill these rapes become up and grown. And whereas before that time, he would never you have to hear of any composition and agreement now at last he was contented to take reason, and be conferred withall about the ransom of as many as were freemen within the Town. And it was covenanted between him and them that they should pay for their redemption * feven ounces of gold a peece. So upon faithfull promife made, and fecurity given, *21.lib fler Pthey yielded themselves: and were kept bound in prison until they had made full pryment of the gold aforefaid. After which, they were sent back under fafe conduct to Cumes. For this is more like to be true, than the report which goeth, That there were sent out after them certain horsemen, who fell upon them and flew them in the way, Most of them were Prenefitins. And where #s. there were of them in all five hundred and seventy in garrison the one half well near, were either by fword or hunger contumed: All the reft, together with their Prætor Manitius, one who aforetime had been a Scribe or Notary) returned fafe unto Prenefte. In memorial and testimony of this his Statue was crefted in the market place of Prenefte, armed in his cuiraffe, clad in a long robe, with his head covered: and three other images, with a title or inteription engraven in a place of Brass, with this tenor: That Manitius had made a vow for the fouldiers who lay in gar-Grison with him at Casilinum. And the same title also was engraven under three other images, set up in the Temple of Fortuna. The Town of Casilinum was reflored again to the Campains, with a strong garrison of 700 souldiers deducted out of the army of Annibal: for fear lest when he was departed once from thence, the Romans should assail them. rufins, is not recorded fo plainly: for neither appeareth evidence by any publice monument and H memoriall of their own, nor yet decree extant of the Romans. At the same time the Petelline (who alone of all the Brutii remained in friendthip and amity with the Romans) were affailted not only by the Carthaginians, (that were possessed of agreat part of the Country about them) but also by the other Brutis with whom they would not joyn in the complet of their rebellion. The Petellins not able of themselves to hold out and endure these dangers, fent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave their aid and affiftance: whose humble prayers and pitious tears for after an answer received, That they should provide and shift for themselves; they fell into lamentable moans and complaints, and lay proffrate upon the earth, before the porch of the Council-House) wrought exceeding compassion and pity in the hearts of the Senators, and also of the people: whereupon the LL, were moved again the second time, by M. Amylim the Prator to deliver their opinion. And when they had cast all about, and well weighed and considered their present stare, and what they wereable to do: being forced to confess, that it lay not in their power to help their Allies, so far distant and remote from them : they willed them to repair home again; and fince they had performed their idelity to the fuil, according to covenant, they gave them leave in this calamity of theirs to take that course that they thought best for themselves. When they were returned with this answer unto the Petellins, their Senat all on a judden was firucken into in h forrows dumps and fearfull maze; that some of them were of mind and gave advice, to abandon the City, and fly every man wherefoever ne could: others were of opinion and perswaded, that seeing they were for saken of their old friends, they should joyn with the o. T ther Brutii, and by their means, turn to Annibal, and come under his protection. Howbeit, a third fide prevailed, who would in no wife that anything should be done over hastily and rashly but that they might meet again, and fit in counsell about the matter. And so it was put off, and respite given untill the next day. Then, after more mature de iberation, and their former fear somewhat affwaged, the principall personage there affembled grew to this resolution, namely, To convey all things out of the Territory about them into the City, and to fortife both it and the

Near about one and the fame time, there came Posts with Packets of Letters to Rome, from out of Sicily and Sardinia. Those out of Sicily from Offacilius the Vice-Prator, were read first in the Senat-House importing these news: That L. Furins the Prætor was come out of Affrick, L and with his fleet arrived at Lil baum: himfest fore hurt, and lying at point of death: that neithe fouldiers, nor failers, and marriner, had their money or corn duly paid at the day; neither indeed was there any to be had, for to keep touch and make painent: moving and ad iting them earnestly to send supply thereof with all on enient speed; and if they thought so good, one also of the new choien Præsor: to succeed after frim. To the same effect in manner wrote (ornel, Mammula the Pro-Prator, out of Sardinia, as touching that point of money and orn, Answer was returned to the one and the other That they had it not, and ther ore they were to look themselves both to their Armados and Armies and to provide for them Offacilius, who addressed Embassadors unto K. Hiero (the only refuge and flay of in cour that the people of Rome had) received for fouldiers pay, as much filver as was needfull, and corn to ferve fix months. The confederat Cities M likewise in Sardinia contributed liberally unto Cornelius, and served his turn. At Rome also for want of filver, there were (by a law published by Minutius, Tribune of the Commons) created three Bankers, called Triumviri Menfarii to wit, L. Emylius, who had been Conful and Cenfor: M. Attilius Regulas, twice Conful afore time: and L. Soribonius Libo. a Tribune of the Commons for the time being. Two Duumvirs also were choien, M, and C, Attilii, who dedicated the Temple of Concord which L. Manlius Prator had vowed before. Three High Priests also were confecrated Q. Cecilius Mettellus, Q. Fabius Max. and Q. Fulvius Flaceus all to supply the rooms of P. Scaminus late deceased : of L. Emplius Paulus the Conful, and Q. Elius Patus, flain both in the

Now when as the LL of the Senat had fulfilled other wants, and made up all decaies and brea-N ches, which fortune by continual calamities and losses had wrought and brought upon them, so far forth, as by any wildom and policy of man, they could provide for: at length they had respect and regard unto themselves also,, even to the desolate estate of the Coun il-House, and the unfrequent number of Senators, affembling to the publike Councill of the City, For fince that L. Emplins and C. Fliminius were Centors, there had been chosen no new Sepators, not withfranding that in five years space, what with un ortunate battels, and what with other particular chances, somaby of them had milicarried. And when M. Emiliur the Prator, in the ablence of the Dictator (who after the lols of Casilinum was now gone again to the host) had at the request of them all, propounded this matter: then Sp. Carvilrus, after he had in a long oration complained not only of the pentiry but also of the small choice of those Citizens, who were capable of Senetors digniry, frakeinto the point, and faid. "That he held it a matter of good importance both for the "Till repairing and reftoring of the decayed body of the Senat, as also for to bind the Latine Na-" tion in a more fast bond of amity, that two Senators out of every State of the Latines (if the LL. " of the Senat of Rome would agree unto it) should be enfranchied Chizens of Rome, and taken "into the Senat in place of those that were deceased. This opinion of his the LL of the Senate could abide to hear with no better ear than in times past they accepted the motion and demand of the Latines themselves in that behalf. And there being throughout the whole House a great

A mattering, for very indignation and diffain of those his words, Manlius above the rest brake out into this speech, and said; "That they were not all dead, but one man yet was left alive of that "house and line, out of which a Consul (when time was) threatned in the Capitol, that he would "kill with his own hand, that Latine whom/oever he faw fitting in the Councel-House of Rome. With that, O Fabins: " Never was there a thing, quoth he, propounded and mentioned in the "Senat-honic, in a worfe and more unfeafonable time, than at this prefent, when as the hearts and " affections of our Allies being fo wavering their faith and alleageance fo doubtful, the very break-"ing and broaching of such a matter as this, were enough to set them farther out. And therefore "this inconfiderat speech of one foolish vain person, is to be suppressed and buried presently with R "the filence of all men, and never once to be spoken of again. And if everthere were uttered at "Councel Table, any fecret and mystery, which were to be conceased, this of all other ought most "to be kept close, hidden and imothered in oblivion, and reputed as never ipoken at all. So this "matter was dasht, and dyed there in the very birth. Then they proceeded and a greed, to creat Dictator for the choosing of Senators, one that had been Censor aforetime, and of all those who had been Cenfors, and were then living, the most ancient : and thereto they gave order, that C. Terenting Varro the Conful should be sent for, to the nomination of that Dictator. Who being returned out of Apulia, leaving the camp there with a good guard, and taking long journeys, until he was come to Rome: the night next following (as the manner was) created by authority of an act of Senat, M. Fabius Buteo, Dict. for fix moneths, without a General of Horse. When he was a mounted up with his Serjeants to the Roftra, [which is the place of publike audience] for to make a speech unto the people, he said : "That he neither allowed of two Dictators at one time. "(a precedent never feen and known afore) nor yet could take himfelf for a Dictator, fo long as "he was without his General of Cavalry. I millike also (quoth he) that the entire authority and "power of Cenfors, should be put into the hands of one and the feli-lame man, twice : and that a "Dictator should have the rule and government for fix moneths, unless he were created for the " managing of wars. And therefore (faid he) I will my felf limit and gage those things, which " fortune, occasion of the times, and necessity have made excessive and beyond all measure pow-"erful. Neither am I minded to depole or displace any of those from his Senators dignity, whom "C. Flaminius , and L. Emplicus late Cenfors , have admitted into the Senat : but only , that a O "transcript and rehearfal be made of their names, for that I would not have it lie in the power of " one man alone, to centure and give judgement of the fame and behavior of a Senator : but this " course will I take in substituting new Senators in the room of the dead, that it may appear, and "be said; That this Order and degree is preferred before that, and not one person before another. So after that the names of the old Senators were copied out and read, then he chose first into the place of them that were deceased, those who after the time of L. Empliss and C. Flaminius Cenfors, had born any Magistracy of State, and of the chair, and yet were not elected Senators. And according as they had exercised their office one before another in order of time, so were they cholen first Senators in their course. This done, he made a second electron, of those who had been Ædiles, Tribuns, Pretors, or Queltors : and last of all, such as could shew the ipoils taken from the E enemies of Rome hanging in their houses: or had been honoured and rewarded with a Civick gatland. Thus after he had with right great approbation and contentment of all men, taken into the Senat 177. forthwith he refigued up his office, delcended from the pulpit a private man more, and so with a goodly train of men he was accompanied, and conducted home to his house. The next night following, the Conful returned toward the army, without making the Senate F privy and acquainted with his departure, for fear he should have been detained will in the City for the foleran election of new Magistrats. The morrow after the Senate decreed, upon a motion propounded by M. Pomponius the Pretor, to write unto the Dictator, that if he thought it were for the good of the common-weal, he would together with his General of the Cavalry, and M. Marcellus the Pretor, repair to Rome to subrogate and choose new Consuls, to the end that when they were all together in place, the LL. of the Senate might by them take knowledge in what state the Common-wealth stood and consult how to provide for every thing. They all came that were fent for accordingly, leaving behind them their Lieutenants for the government and conduct of the Legions. The Dictator spake of himself but little, and with much modelty, ascribing the greatest part of the honor unto T. Sempronius Gracebus, and then summoned the general assembly G for the Election : in which were choice Coff. L. Postbumius the third time (who then was ablent, and as L. Deputy ruled the Province of Gallia) and T. Sempronius Gracehus, who at that time commanded the Cavalry, and repaired to Rome with speed. Then were elected Pretors M. Valerius again, discharged and put from him the Serjeants, and came and stood beneath among the other multitude that attended their own private busine's: trifling out the time for the nonce and of purpole, because he would not have the people to leave the common place for to wait upon him.

Howbeit, for all that lingering and flay which he made, the peoples affection cooled never the Levinus, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and Q. Matins Scavola. The Distator after the choosing of these Magistrats, returned to Theanum, wherethe army wintred : leaving the General of the Horse behind at Rome, to the end that he being to enter into his government, within few dayes after, might confult with the LL. of the Senat as touching the levy and enrolling new armies against the year enshing.

* i. The term of ten years.

The three and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Whiles they were in their bufieft and deepest conferences about these matters, news came of a. fresh overthrow: fuch was the fortune of that year to heap one calamity in the neck of another: to wit, that L. Post hamins the Conful elect, was himfelt flain, and the army together with him in The defeature Gallia, utterly defeated and destroyed. The manner of which misfortune was this. There was of L. Pofibumi. in those parts a wide and huge forrest (which the Gauls call Litana) through which Pofibumian or L. ropoumithat they might fland upright of themfelves to long as they were not ftirred, fo, being forced never to little, they must needs fall down, Now had Post burnius the conduct of two Roman legions; and of aflociats belides, from the high coasts of the upper Sea, he had enrolled to many souldiers, as that he came into the enemies countrey 25000 ftrong. The Gauls who had beltowed themselves. in ambush round about the skirts of the wood, to soon as the army was all engaged within the fireights of the paie, shoved from them the trees (so guilded) which stood next unto them. and they fell one upon another (flanding as they did, to ticklish of themselves, and ready to totter and come down on both fides of the way) and in the fall overthrew withal and covered over and over both horse and man, with their armour and munition, so as scarce ten of them escaped alive. For as most of them were felled and strucken frank dead, either with the bodies of the trees, or the broken arms and boughs; so the rest of the multitude, affrighted with this unexpected and unhappy accident, were killed by the Gauss that belet all the streights and passages of the wood; and of that great number, they took few prisoners, who making towards a bridge standing over the River, were intercepted by the way, and flopped by the enemies that kept the advenue of the bridge: in which place Pofthumius was flain, for he strived all that ever he could, not to be taken alive. K The spoils of this General Captain, together with the head cut off from the rest of his body, the Boians with great joy and folemnity brought into the Temple that amongst them was reputed most holy and facred. And after they had clenfed the head, as their manner is, they enchaced and garnished the skull with gold, and that leeved as well for an holy vessel to facrifice and Divine withal, upon high and feltival dayes, as also for an ordinary drinking mazar for the high Prielt, and other Prelats of that Temple. The booty allo which the Gauls gained of their enemies, was of no less importance than the victory: for although a great part of the beatls and living creatures was crushed and squeased to death with the fall of the wood, yet all other things, by reason that nothing was feattered and loft by flight, were found wholly on the ground, as the fouldiers lay along in that, order as they marched. These world tidings being reported, the City was for many dayes in such fear and perplexity.

to the other, as if it had been night continually. Then the Senat gave the Ædiles in charge to walk all about, and command the shops to be set open, and to make no more shew in the City of publick forrow and heavinets. Then T. Semprenius affembled a Senate, spake comfortably to the LL, of the Councel, and exhorted them, that " as they were not diffused with the overthrow " and discomfiture at Canna, to they would not be cast down and daunted with lighter and imal-"ler losses and calamities. For if it might please the Gods to blesse them, and give them good " speed (as they hoped no less) against the Carthaginian enemies and Annibal, the war with the " Gsuls might without danger and inconvenience either be laid aude clean, or put off and defer-M "red. As for the revenge of this deceitful practile, it should reft still in the power either of the immortal Gods, or of the people of Rome, to be performed one time or other. But for the prefent, they were to confult and refolve concerning Annibal their grand enemy, and to grow to some point and conclusion of such forces as were meet for that war. And first himself discounted and laid down what companies of foot and Horfe, what number of citizens, and how many confederats were in the army of the Dictator. After him, Marcellus shewed and recounted the proportion of his own power and their strength. Also, what forces, and of what quality, were with C. Terentius the Conful in Aprilia, they were required to declare, who might speak upon their knowledge. Then they proceeded to cast and examine, whether two Consular armies well appoint M ted and furnished, were fufficient to go through so great a war. Thus for that year they let France alone, albeit they had good canse to be angry, and were provoked that way to follow revenge. The Dictator his army, was appointed unto the Conful. As for the forces under the leading of Marcellen, confilting of them that fled out of the field at Canna, those they ordained to be sent over into Sicily, there to remain in tervice follong as the war continued in Italy: and that thither also should be posted over out of the Dictator his Legions, all those souldiers who were able to do least (ervice, there to abide in fouldiery, without any other limitation of time than that, which the * Laws in that case provide for. For the other Conful, who should be substituted in stead of L. Posthum:us, there were affigned two Legions of Roman Citizens: and order was given, to foon as the Auspices would permit, he should be elected with speed. Likewise it was agreedupon o and ordained, to lend for two legions belides out of Sicily: but of which, the Coff. unto whom those Legions aforesaid of the City were allotted, should take what souldiers he thought needful. Finally, C. Terentins the Conful, had his commission of command continued for another year, without empairing one jot of the army, which he had in his conduct for the guard and defence of Apulia.

Amids thele affairs and preparations in Italy, the war went forward nevertheleffe in Spain, and ever to that day prospered on the Romans side. P. and Cn. Scipios divided their forces so, A 25 Cm, should fer to by Land, and Publius at Sea with the navy. Afdrubal the chief Colonel and Commander there of the Carthaginians, distructing his own strength both by Sea and Land, kept himself aloof, and far from the enemy, in sure places of safety; Unto whom, after long suit and inflant prayers, were sent 4000 foot, and 500 horse out of Affrick for supply. Having thus at initial prayers, with new helps gathered with hope, he encamped neeret to his enemy, and gave order and direction withal, that the Armado should be rigged and decked for the defence of the Islands, and the Sea-coafts. And whiles he was thus beginning hotly to make war again, he was fuddainly diftempered and disquieted with the revolt of the Admirals and great Captains of the navy: who for their fearful abandoning of the fleet upon Iberus, having been sharply checked and rebu-Rked, were never after trusty and sure, either to the Colonel himself, or to the State of Carthage. These fugitive renegats had first practised to raise troubles and insurrections in the Land of the Carpefii, and by their folliciting and infligation, certain Cities were procured to rebel, and one of them they had forced by affault. Wherenpon, Afdrubal turned his forces from the Romans. and bent them wholly against that Nation: and with a cruel army entring the frontiers of the enemies, determined to give the charge upon Galbus, a Nobieman, and renowned chieftain of the Carpefians, even before the City, that some few dayes before was lost, where the said Galbus with a puissant power kept himself strongly encamped. Having therefore sent out before, certain vancurriers lightly armed, to train forth and draw the enemies to skirmish, he made out withal certain Companies of his Infantry fundry wayes to over-run and spoil the country, and likewise to Catch up and meet with all straglers, disperied in the fields. Whereupon, at one time there was a skirmish before the camp; and likewise in the fields, they were either flain, or put to flight. But afterwards, having by divers wayes from all parts recovered again the camp, suddainly they shaked off all fear, plucked up their hearts, and thought themselves good enough, not only to defend their fort and hold, but also to bid the enemy battail. They fallied out therefore of the camp in good array, shouting, dancing and hopping after their manner to as this unexpected boldness and courage of theirs, terrified the enemies, who a little before had challenged them to fight. Whereupon Afdrubal himself withdrew and retired his power for more security to an hill of good height, and fituat for his advantage, with a River likewise between him and his enemies. The light armed vancurriers also, and the forlorn hope, together with the Horsemen that rode scat-O tering abroad, he caused thither to repair for their better safety. And because he trusted neither hill nor river, he fortified himfelf with a trench and rampier befides. In this alternat and interchangeable fear on both fides, there passed some bickerments; and blows were dealt between. In which, neither the Numidian Horsemen were able to match the Spaniards in that kind, nor the Moores archers could make their part good with the light Carpenans targetiers, who in nimbleness and swiftness were as good as they; and for courage and bodily strength, far better. These Carpefians feeing they neither could provoke Afdrubal to a battail, with all their braving hard under his camp, nor yet eafily by affault win it, they took by force the City Alena, into which Afdrubal when he first invaded the Frontiers of his enemies, had conveighed fore of corn and other victuals: yea, and became LL, of all the country thereabout. And they grew so lusty and audaci-E ous, that neither in their march and array, nor within their camp they would be ruled and ordered by any mans command. This fecure and carelels negligence of theirs, when Afdrubal perceived to artie (as usually it doth) upon good success and prosperity; after an exhortation made to his fouldiers, to charge upon the enemies, roving abroad without their colours, he descended from the hill, and marched in battail array against the camp. So soon as the Spaniards were advertifed by those who came in great haft, and fled from the Sentinels and corps de quard, that he was coming, and neer at hand, with a great outcry they gave the alarm. And as every man could get weapon in hand they ran upon the head to battail, without direction and commandment of Captain, without fignal, enfign, and order, confutedly. When the formost in the ranguard were joyned in conflict and come to hand-fight, some of their fellows were seen running on heaps and by F troups, and others were not well come forth of the camp: At the first the enemy was terrified with their bold adventure. Afterwards, as they encountred, thin and loo ely raied, with the enemies thickand closely ranged together, seeing themselves too weak, and not sufficient, so few in number to defend themselves, they looked back one upon another for succour: and being on every fide put back, and forced to retreat and lose ground, they call themselves into a ring, and thus thrust (as they were) close together, body to body, and armour to armour, they were so pent and peffered in so narrow a ground, that they had scarce room enough to wield their weapons: so they were compassed and environed round with the enemy, and for a good part of the day hewen, in peeces, and maffacred. Some few of them that brake through by dint of fword, escaped to the woods and mountains. With like fear the camp was abandoned: and the day following, G the whole nation yeelded, and came under the subjection of the Carthaginians. Long they continued not quiet. For within a while news came from Carthage, that Aldrubal should make what speed he could with his army into Italy. Which rumour being blown abroad through Spain, turned in manner all their hearts away unto the Romans. Whereupon Astrabal addressed his Letters immediately to Carthage, shewing what hurt the same of his departure had done already : and in case he should set forward on his journey, and go out of those parts, all Spain would turn to the Romans, before he were passed the river Iberus. For over and befides, that he had not strength enough to leave behind for a garrison, nor a sufficient commander in Read of himself, the Generals of the Roman armies, who had fet foot in Spain, were; fach, as he might hardly make head against them with equal putssance. And therefore, if they had any regard of Spain, he advised them to fend one to succeed him with aftrong power: For he should have his hands full, and enough to do in the Province full out things as to runatly as they could. These letters, albeit at the first fight they greatly troud the Senat, yet because the Italian affairs feemed of more moment and greater importance, wrought no alteration in their intended course, either for Asarbal himself, or his forces. Howbeit Himiles was tent with a complete and competent army, and a greater Armado, both for the holding of Spain in their alleageance, and also for their defence by Sea and Land, Who having passed over with all his power, as well for Land-service as the Sea, fortified his camp, drawn his ships ashore, laid them up I in drie Land, and empaled them strongly all about; himself in person with his elect and most choice men of arms, made what hast possibly he could, through nations partly enemies, partly doubtful and untrusty, and staied not either in one place or other (but evermore standing upon his guard) until he was come to Aldrubal. After he had declared unto him the order decreed by the Senat, and what he had in commission, and taken him elf direction likewise from him, in what manner the war in Spain was to be managed, he returned back again to his own camp. In which voyage to and fro, he travailed fafely by no one thing more than by speedy expedition. For he was ever gone from a place, before the people could agree together, and make head against him. Now Afdrul al, before that he dislodged and set his army on foot out of those parts, levied sums of money of all the Cities and states under his jurisdiction : for well he knew, that Annibal had paid K fweetly before him, for his paffage through certain countries: and as well he wift befides, that the Gauls he was fain to wage: for amongst them no money, no men. And if he undertook and entred upon that great expedition, poor and bare of filver, he had never reached to far as the Alps. Thus having in great half railed and collected his monies, he came down to the river Iberus.

When the Romans heard of the proceedings and defignments of the Carthaginians, and likewife of the journey of Asarubal: both the Generals (laying all other matters apart) prepared to joyn their whole forces together, to oppose themselves, and to withstand such intended attempts: supposing and considering, that if Annibal (who by himself alone was an enemy to Italy hardly (upportable) were once seconded by Colonel Astrabal and the Spanish army, the Empire of Rome would foon be at an end. Upon these careful cogitations being grieved and perplexed, they aftembled a: I their power neer to Iberus; and after they had paffed over the river, and long countailed whether they should encamp themselves and abide the coming of the enemies to bid them battail; or by invading and affailing the affociats and subjects of the Carthaginians, toffay the enemy and hinder his intended journy: they reloved at length and made preparation to affauit Ibera (to named of the river neer by) the richest and most wealthy City at that time, of all others in those parts. Whereof when Afdrubal was advertised, he for to help his friends, advanced himself likewise to set upon another City lately yeelded to the Romans, and reduced under their subjection. And so the Romans after they had begun to lay siege to Ibera, gave over that enterprite, and made head against Asdrubol himself. And for some few dayes they lay incamped five miles alunder one from the other, not without some light skirmishes : but never came to pitch a M fair field. At length upon one and the same day (as if they had been so agreed afore) they hapned on both fides to fet out the fignal of bartail, and to come forth with all their power into the plain ground. The Romans thood arranged in three battailons: one part of the Infantry was placed before the standards in the vanguard, another Regiment bestowed behind in the reregard the men of arms flanked the fides like wings. On the other part, Afarabal strengthned his main battel with Spaniards: in the right point he marshalled the Carthaginians, in the left, the Affricans, As for the auxiliar and mercenary Hotsemen, whom he waged and hired; such as were Numidians, he ordained afront the Carthaginians footmen to guard them: the rest that were Affricans, he distributed and disposed about the skirts and edges of the battailons. Neither were all the Numidians placed in the right flank, but such as after the guise and manner of Vaulters, led two N Horses appeare: and used often times in the mids of the horsest constict, to leap armed as they were from their wearied horie, to another fresh one. So nimble are they themselves, and so tra-Gable and well taught to their hands are their Horses. Thus stood they arranged on both sides in order of battail. The Captains of either part for hopes in manner nothing unequal: for neither in number or quality of fouldiers, was there any great oddes between them: Mary, for courage and heart, there was great difference and inequality in the fouldiers themselves. For the Romans (notwithstanding they sought far from home) were so perswaded by their leaders, that they fought for Italy and the City of Rome: and therefore as if the whole hope of their fafe return into their country, were to be tried and decided in this one battail, they resolved either to win the day orto dve for it. On the other fide, the fouldiers were not fo resolute, for most of them being Spaniards, would have chosen rather to be conquered and overcome in Spain, than with conquest and victory to be drawn into Italy. And therefore at the first shock, when scarcely the darts and javelins were anced and let flye, their main battail retreated: and fo foon as the Romans with great violence redoubled the charge, they turned their backs and fled. Howbeit in both flanks the fight was hot enough. The Carthaginians of the one fide, the Affricans on the other, charged the Romans very hard, and fought fore against them, as if they had them invironed round about within their battailons. But when as the whole power of the Romans were once rallied and gatheA red together in the mids, they were ftrong enough to remove and fet back the wings of the enemies. So they maintained fight in two divers places at once. But both in the one and the other, the Romans (after they had discomfitted the main battail in the mids) were no doubt, much better, as well in number, and also in strength and vigour of men. Many a tall fellow was there slain. And had not the Spaniards at the first when the battail was scarce began, sled amain by heaps, very few of the whole battail had elcaped and temained alive. The Hortemen fought little or not at all. For the Moors and Numidians, fo toon as they espied the battail to shrink and lote ground, presently all on a fuddain fled as fait as they could, and left the fides and flanks of the faid battail naked. driving afore them the Elephants withal. And even Afdrab at himfelf, who mainteined the skira mish to the very last, escaped with some few out of the thickest massacre and execution. The Romans took their camp and rifled it. This battail was of such import and confequence, that it caused all the Spaniards, who were before but wavering to turn wholly to the Romans, and lett Afdrubal no hope at all, to pass with his forces into Italy, nor so much as to make abode with lafety in Spain. The news hereof being bruited abroad and fent to Rome, by the letters of the two Scipio's. great joy there was, not fo much for the victory, as because Afdrabal was tied by the foot, and Itaied for coming into Italy.

Amidsthele exploits in Spain, * Petelia (a City of the Brutii having endured the fiege and manv affault for certain moneths) was finally won by Himiteo, one of Annival Captains. But that victory coll the Carthaginians much bloud, and many a fore wound. No force nor violence overc came the belieged Petelians more, than very famine. For having confirmed and extenup all food of corn, all fielh of four footed beafis whatfoever : they were driven at length to feed and live upon shoomakers lether, weeds, and roots, tender barks of trees, and the crops of briers and brambles: and they gave not over fo long as they were able to fland on their legs upon the walls, and

Aunits of after the winning of Petelia, conducted his army against * Confenia, which being not * Cofenza. so valiantly defended, was within few dayes (urrendred up into his hands. Neer about the same time, a power of the Brutians alio, laid fiege unto Croton, a City built and inhabited by the Greeks, and in times past, mighry in men and munition : but now at this time so distressed with manifold and grievous calamities, that of all ages one with another, they were not able to make twenty D thouland men. And therefore no marvail, if the enemies were foon mafters of the City, being fo destitute as it was of Citizens to defend it. Only the Castle they kept still, into which there were some that escaped in that tumult when the City, was taken, out of the mids of the massacre. The Locrians likewife revolted unto the Brutii and the Carthaginians, by reason that the common multitude were fraudulently betrayed by the chief and principal Citizens. The Rhegines only of all that country, continued both true unto the Romans, and also at their own liberty to the very last, The same disposition to revolt, was to be seen even in Sicily, in so much as the very house of Hiero was not cleer and free in all parts from rebellion. For Gelo his eldeft fon, having in contempt both the olde age of his father, and also (after the overthrow at Canna,) the society and friendship of the Romans, turned unto the Carthaginians. And he had, no doubt, made a general alteration E in Sicily, but that his death came between and cut him off; which hapned to jump, even when he was arming the multitude, and folliciting his friends to rebellion, that his very father himself was drawn into deep inspition that he took his life away. These were the occurrents that fell out that year with variable event, in Italy, Affrick, Sicily, and Spain.

In the end of the same year, Q. Fabius Maximus moved the Senat, and made request, that the Temple of Venus Erzeina, which he had vowed being Dictator, might now be dedicated. And the Senat made a decree. That Titus Semp onius, Conful elect, should so soon as he was entred into his office, propole unto the people, that they would creat two Dunmvirs for the dedication of Temples. And in honour of Emplius Lepidus, who had been Conful twice, and Augur, his three lons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quinius, exhibited certain funeral games for three r dayes space; and a shew in the Common place likewise for three dayes together, of two and twenty pair of iword-sensers, to fight at sharp to the death. The Curule Ediles, C. Letterins, and T. Sempronius Graccus, now Confolelect, who in his Adileftup had been General of the Horsemen, set out the Roman games, which were renewed and continued still for three dayes. Likewife, the Playes of the Commons, were thrice exhibited by M. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Claudius Marcellus. Now after three years expired of the Punick war, T. Sempronius the Conful, began his government upon the * Ides of March. As for the Prators, Q. Fulvius Flacens, who had afore-time been Conful and Centor, obteined by lot the jurisdiction of the Citi-. zens: and M. Valerius Corvinus, of the strangers and aliens. To Appius Claudius Pulcher was alotted the government of Sicily: and to Q. Mutins Scavola of Sardinia. M. Marcellus was by G the people allowed to have the authority of a Vice Conful, in regard that he above all the Roman Captains, after the defeat of Canna, mannaged his affairs and warred prosperously in

Now the very first day that the Senat was assembled in the Capitol , they decreed upon the first motion, that within the compasse of that year, there should be levied a double tax or tribute and that one fingle tribute should be forthwith gathered, for present pay to all the souldiers, faving those that served at Came. Then concerning the armies this order was set down : Imprimie, that T. Semprenius the Conful, should appoint the two legions of Citizens a certain day to meet at Cales. Item , that fix legions should be conducted to the camp of Clandina above to Swelfula. Item, that the legions which there were and those consisted for the most part of the refidue of the Cannian army) Ap, Claudius Pulcher the Pretor, should put over Sea into Sieily : and es for thole that were in Sicily, they should be transported to Rome. Item, unto that Tring Which was appointed to meet by a day, at Cales, M. Clanding Marcellus was fent : and he was comminded to conduct the legions of the Citizens to the camp of Clandins. Last of all, to receive the charge of the old army, and to lead it into Sicily, T. Metiline Croto Lieutenant, was fent by Ag. Clandian. Men looked at first, and yet they faid nothing, that the Conful should call an affeinbly for the creating of a Colleague unto him. But after that they faw that M. Marcellus was lent out of the way (as it were of purpole) whom above all others they were defirous to be the Conful for t that year, in regard of his notable good fervice whiles he was Pretor, there arose much muttering in the Senat house. Which the Conful perceiving: "My LL. quoth he , it was for the good of "the Common-wealth, that both M. Clauding should go into Campain to exchange the armies: "and allo that the Election of Confuls, should not be proclaimed, until that he wete returned again " from thence, with dispatch of that bufinels which he had in charge : that ye might have a Con-"ful, fuch a one as the present condition of the State required, and your selves most desired, So there was no more speech of the election, until Marcellus was come back again. In this mean time were two Dunmvirs created, Q. Fabius Maximus for the dedication of one Chappel to Venus Ergeina, and T.Offacilius Craffin, of another to the Goddels Mens. Both frand upontic Capitol bill divided afunder no more than with one only conduct of water paffing between. And as concerning the three hundred Campain Hordemen, who had served out their full time of warfare faithfully, and were come to Rome, a motion was propounded to the people, that they should be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and in like manner, that they should be reputed as free Denizens of Comes, from the day afore that the Capnans revolted from the people of Rome and rebelled. The chiefelt came of proposing this act, was this, because themselves denied flatly that they knew, to whom they did appenain, feeing they had abandoned their old native countrey and as yet were not enrolled and incorporat into that state, unto which they had retired. After that Marcellus was come again from the army, the folemn day of election of a Conful in place of L. Posthumius, was published. And with exceeding great content of all men, Marcellus was thefen : and forthwith he was to begin his Magistracy, At whose his entrance, it happed to thun-'der : and the Augurs being called to give their opinion of it, pronounced that they thought he was not rightfully created. And the Senators gave it one commonly and bruited abroad, that the Gods were nor well pleased therewith, because (forsooth) two Cost, were elected of the commonalty (a thing never feen before.) Whereupon Marcellar refigned up his place, and in his room was sub-Rithred Fabius Maie, the third time.

That year the Sea burned. At Sinueffs a cow brought forth a horse fole. And at Lanuvium in the Temple of Iuno Hofpita, certain flatues or images dropped with bloud: and about that Temple it rained flones. For which showr, there was solemnised, according to the enflomable manner, a Novendial facrifice. The other prodigious figns likewife were explat with great care and heedful regard. The Confuls then, parted their armies between them. Fabins took charge of thole M forces which had been commanded by M. Junius the Dictator. Semprinius had the conductof all the voluntary fouldiers, and befides of 25000 of Auxiliaries fent from the confederats. M.V. lering the Pretor had the legions appointed for him, that were returned out of Sicily. M. Clandie us the Vice-conful, was tent unto that army, which lay in gariion at Nole, above Sneffula. And the Pretors took their journey into Szcily and Sardinia. The Confuls, whenfoever they would affemble the Senat, proclaimed that the Senators, and all others that had lawful authority to freak their mind and deliver their opinion in the Councel-House, should meer at the gate Capena. The Pretors, those that were Judges in the Court, and to whom the civil jurisdiction appertained, et rected their Tribunal icars and places of Affizes at the publick Fish-pool; and thither they commanded all writs to be returned, and apparence there to be made. And for that year all pleas and h judgements of causes passed there.

In this mean time news came to Carthage (from whence Mago the brother of Annibal was minded to transport and fet over into Italy 12000 footmen, and 1500 horsemen, ao Elephants, and rooo talents of lilver, together with a guard and supply of 60 gallies) That in Spain things went untowardly : and that all the Cities of Spain (in a manner) were revolted unto the Romans. Some there were of opinion, to withdraw Mago with that fleet and power of his, from the enterprise of Italy into Spain. Confidering there was good hope shewed of a suddain, recover again Sardi-.nia, for that there was but a small power of Romans there; and Corneline the old Lord Deputy; well acquainted with the State of the Province, was now upon his departure from thence, and a hew expected in his turn. Over and besides, that the Satoinians were weary already of the Romans government, which they had to long endured, as who the year that palt was, had cyrannife over them creelly, and exercised their authority with oppression, coverously imposing upon them hard exactions and tributs, and levying of them a molt unjust taxation and contribution of comand finally they wanted nothing but an head, upon whom they might relie themselves. To this effect there was an Embassage tent secretly from the Lords and Princes of the Island. And the principal actor and procurer hereof, was Herficora, a man in those dayes of greatest authority and power among them. Upon these tidings aforesaid, happing to just at one time, they were both

A difquieted and allo refreshed. So they feat Mago with his fleet, and other forces into Spain; and they choice for the expedition into Sardinia, Afdrabal furnamed Calvin, for the L. General, furnished and appointed with as great a power almost, as Mago had.

At Rome likewife, the Confuls having dispatched the affairs of the City, addressed the mielves to the war. T. Sempronius appointed Sinneffa to be the Rendez. wons, where the fouldiers should meet at a certain day. And Q. Fabius, by aporder and direction from the Senat, made an Edict, That all men thould before the first day of fully next eniuing , gather all their corn out of the countries, and convey the fame into the principal walled ftrong Towns : proclaiming that who forever did not accordingly, their fields he would lay walt ; fell their fervants in port tale at the fpear, and B fet their farms and villages a fire. Not fo much as the Pretors themselves (created for civil jurisdiajon and to decide law matters) were freed and exempted from the conduct of war. As for Valerius the Pretor, be was appointed to go into Apulia, for to receive the army of Terentius: and when the legions were returned out of Sicily, to imploy them especially for the guard and defence of that country; and that the army of Terentins should be fent with some one of the Lieutenants. And M. Valerius had 25 fail allowed him, to keep and defend all the Sea coaffs between * Brandulum and * Tarentum. The like number of thips was affigued to Q. Fulvius the City Pre- * Brindiff. tor, for to guard the River fide, neer adjoyning to the City of Roms. C. Terentins the Proconful * Taranio. had in charge to take up by commission souldiers in the Picene country, and to guard those quarters. And T. Ottasilius Craffus, after that he had dedicated the Temple of Mens in the Capitol,

C was fent into Sicily, as Lord Admiral of the Armado there. Upon this war between two of the mightielt Cities, and most purificate faces of the World, there was not a King and Prince, no, nor a Nation under Heaven, but was amufed. Among whom Philip King of the Macedonians, had an eye thereto, and was more intentive, in that he was neerer unto Italy, and only divided from thence by the Jonian Sea. He at the first, when the bruit came to his cars, That Annibal was pafled beyond the Alps: as be joyed much, that there was war kindled between the Romans and the Carthaginians, fo, as long as it was uncertain, whether not on was the stronger, he wavered in mind and was in suspence, whether of the twain he should wish to have the victory. But after that he heard once, that in three feveral battails one after another, Annibal and the Carthaginians had gotten the better hand, he enclined to the fortunat fide, and of fent Embassadors unto Annibal: who falling off, and delirous to avoid the Havens of Brand finns and Tarentam, which were guarded and kept by the Romans fleet, arrived and landed at the Temple of Iuno Lacinia: and so through Apulia, travailing toward Casua, chanced to light upon the mids of the Romans corps de guard, and were brought before M. Valerius Levinus the Lord Deputy, being then encamped before Nuceria. Where Xenophanes, the principal of the Emballadors, bashed not to say, That he was sent from King Philip, to treat and conclude a league and amity with the people of Rome, and had commission and direction to the Coniuls, to the Senat likewife and people of Rome, to that effect. Valerius taking great contentment to hear of this new fociety and friendship with so noble a King; especially upon the rabellion of so many old allies, courteoully intreated and friendly entertained this falle hearted enemy, in flead of a trulty friend; and

E appointed diverte to accompany him forward, to guide him carefully in the wayes, and to thew him what places, what passages and streights were held and kept, either by the Romans, of the enemies. Xenophanes with these instructions passed through the midit of the Roman guards' into Campania, and to the next way arrived at the camp of Annibal, and made a league and amity with him, under these conditions and capitulations. Impremit, That King Philipshould with a right puissant Armada (for that he was supposed able to secout 200 fail) pais over into Italy, wask and spoil all the Sea coasts, and to his power maintain war by Sea and Land. Item, That when the war was finished, all Italy, together with the very City of Rome should be possessed by the Carthaginians and Annibal, and unto him all the pillage and booty likewife thould belong. Item, When Italy was thus subdued, that they should fail into Greece, and wage war with what Princes E there they pleased, and that all the Cities of the main, and the Islands which lay to Macedony, should fall unto Philip, and be annexed to his Kingdome. In their terms, and upon their Articles, in manner, was the league concluded and confirmed between the General Annibal, and the Embaffadors of the Macedonians and with them were fent back unto the King for the better ratifying of the said covenants, certain Legats, to wit, Gifgo, Bostar, and Mago, who arrived together at the same Temple aforelaid, of Iuno Licinia, where there rid closely a ship at anchor, expecting their return. From whencebeing departed, they were not to foon lanched out into the deep, and had taken the open Sea, but they were descried by the Roman fleet that guarded the coasts of Calubria, Q. Pulvinis Flacous made out certain Coreyreans, to purioe and fetch in that fhip. Whereupon, the Macedonians began to flie, but leeing themselves overmatched in swittness of fail and

G. notable to make way with them, they yeelded themselves unto the Romans, and were presented unto the Admiral; Who demanded what they were, from whence they came, and whither they were bound. Xenophanes who had already iped io well by making of a lye, began to cog again, and fay, That he was fent from Philip unto the Romans: that he came unto M. Valerius, because to him only he was able to pais in fafety, but could not peffibly get beyond Campania, being foltrongly kept withgarisons of the enemies. But afterwards, upon the fight of the Carthaginian habit and apparel, they began to suspect the Embassadors of Annibal: and they being questioned withal, their speech and language bewrayed them. Then was their retinue taken apart, and threatned to confeis. Letters also were found upon them, sent from Annibal unto Philip.concerning the peace. It between the King of the Macedonians and Annibal. Upon these matters thus detected and certainly known, it was thought good to convey the Embassadors and their Company with all speed prisoners to Rome, unto the Senat there, or unto the Consuls wheresoever they were. To this purpose were chosen five Pinnasses that were most liwist, under the conduct, of L. Valirius Ansisa, who had his direction and charge to part these Embassadors in several ships, and keep them sure alander, and to take good heed, that they neither talked nor conferred together.

About the same time it hapned at Rome, that Au. Cornelius Mammula, upon his departure out of the Province Sardinia, made report in what state the Iland stood; namely, that they all exclined to rebellion and war: that Matitu who succeeded after him, presently upon his stift coming, by reason of the ill air and unwholiom water, was fallen into a sicknels, not to quick and dangerous, as chronick and tedious, and would not be able long to endure the service of war: that the army there, as it was sufficient to guard and keep in good order a quiet and peaceable Province, so it could not hold out with the war that was like to ensite. Whereupon the LL of the Senat gavecreer, thould perform and enrol 3000 stoot, and 400 horse, and provide that this legion should pass over with all speed into Sardinia; and send therewish whom it pleased him to conduct and manage the war until Matina were recovered of his disease. For this intent was T. Manium Torquarus sent Governour; one, who had been twice Contal and Censor, and in his consuls had been twice Contal and Censor, and in his

Neer about the same time, there was an Armado sent out from Carthage unto Sardinia, under the leading of Astarbal surnamed Calous, and being sore tossed and beaten with tempetts, was cast upon the Balear llands: where (o far out of order was not only the ship-tackling, but also the very keels and bodies of the ships so shaken) they drew up the ships to shore, and whiles they stayed there about calking and trimming them again, they spent much time.

In Italy whiles the wars began to flake and wax cold, by reason that after the battail of Canna, the strength of the one part was much abated, and their force decayed, and the courage of the other, well allayed and made effeminat: the Campains upon their own heads began to contrive, how to reduce the State of Cumes under their obedience, first folliciting them to revolt from the Romans: and feeing that courie would not speed and take effect, they devised by a fraudulent pra-Rife to compais and entrap them. The Campans use yearly to solemnife a let fealt and sacrifice in a certain place called Hama: and they gave notice unto the Cumans, that the whole Senat of Capua would refort thither: requelling the Senat of Cumes likewife to meet them there, for to confer and confult together in common, how both Cities, the one and the other, might have the fame friends and the same enemies, and no other : giving them withal to understand, that they minded there to have a good guard about them of armed men, for fear of some sodain and dangerous attempt from the Romans. The Cumans, albeit they inspected some treachery, denied nothing, supposing thereby to colour ane cover their own crafty intended designment. Now all this while, T. Sempronisus the Roman Conful, having surveyed and purged his army at Sinue fla, at which place he had made proclamation, that his forces should meet together : passed over the n-M ver Vulturnus, and encamped neer unto Linternum: where because the Souldiers in the standing camp had nothing elfe to do, he exercised them to run often therace and skirmish in aray, to the end that the raw Souldiers (for fuch were the voluntaries for the most part/might by ute and pra-&ife learn how to follow their colours in good order, and in the time of battail know their own ranks and enligns. In these kinds of training, the special care that the General had, and the only thing that he simed at, was their concord and good agreement. And for this purpole, he charged the Lieutenants, and the Colonels and Captains, that they should not cast in any mans teeth one or other, their fortune and condition aforetime, thereby to breed any difcord and heartburning among the companies: and that the old experienced fouldiers should suffer themselves to be but equal in cliate to the new learners: and thole that were born free unto the voluntaries, who had N been flaves: reputing them all of birth good enough, and of gentle bloud descended, unto whom the people of Rome had vouchlated to commit their armor and entigns a faying, that the fame fortune which had driven them to to do, forced them likewife to maintain the fame, and make the best of it, now it was done. The Captains were not more careful in giving these good leffons and inftructions, but the fouldiers were as diligent to observe the same; and within a while their hearts and affections grew to be fo linked and united together, that they forgat generally, in what degree and of what condition each fouldier entred into fervice. Whiles Gracchin was bufied hereabout, the Embassadors of Cames certified him, what kind of Embassage came unto them from the Campans, a few dayes before, and what answer they had returned: advertising him that their fellival day was to be holden three dayes after: that not only the whole Senat would be prefent, but also the camp and army of the Campans. Gracebus having commanded the Cu-O manes to convey all that they had out of the fields and territories about, into their City, and themfelves to keep within their walls: himfelf the day before the folemnity aforelaid of the Campans, removed his power to Cumes, and there incamped. Now Hama is three miles off from thence. The Campans by this time were affembied there in great number, according to appointment : and not far from the place, Marine Alfine the chief head Magistrat of Capua, was incamped closely with fourteen thousand fouldiers. He, what with preparation of the factifice,

A and contriving withal, the deceitful train of treachery, was more buly and careful thereabout. than either in fortifying his camp, or in any other military action. Thus for three dayes continued this festival facrifice at Hama. And ever in the night season it was performed : so, as before midnight all was done and finished, Gracebus supposing that a good time for his amoush to be employed, having fet certain warders before the gates, that no man might go forth to give intelligence, caused the souldiers betwirt the first and tenth hour of the day, I from moon until four of the clock to refresh themselves and take their sleep : that in the beginning of the dark night, they might affemble togather at the watch-word or figual given them. And about the first watch he commanded to display their Ensigns and advance forward: and thus with a still march, he ar-R rived at Hama by midnight; surprised the hold of the Campans, and entred all the gates at once. being negligently, guarded, by reason of their overwatching. Some he killed lying along fast afleep: others, as they returned unarmed from the facrifice. In this night-tumule there were flain more than two thousand, with Marine Alfine himself their leader and 43 Ensigns taken and carried away. Gracehus with the loffe of fewer than one hundred of his fouldiers, having won the camp, retired speedily to Cames, for fear of Annibal, who lay in fort encamped upon Tifata over Capua. And (as he was a provident man and of great forecast) nothing was be deceived in his opinion. For to toon as this defeat was reported at Capua, Annibal supposing that he should at Hame find the army of the Romans (consisting for the most part of raw fouldiers, and those, bonds aves) jocund and lusty above measure, and infolent upon their fresh victory, busic C in tifling their dead enemies thus conquered, driving away booties, and charged with pillage; removed his forces in halt, and marched apace beneath Capua: and encountred with lome of the Campans that were fled, whom he cauled between two guards to be conducted fafe to Capua, and fuch as were hurt and wounded, to be let in waggons and carried thither. Himself found at Hame the camp empty and void of enemies and nothing there but the tokens of a fresh massacre, and the dead bodies of his friends and allies lying here and there icattered. Somethere were that advised him presently to advance forward to Cumer, and to affault the Town, And albeit Annibal was willing enough thereto, and passing desirous (seeing he could not come by Naples) to have Cumes at least, a maritime port-Town, as well as the other; yet because his souldiers had brought nothing with them but their wespons, as being led forth to march in fact his, he retired D back again to his fort and camp upon Tsfata. From whence, at the important prayers of the Campans, the day following he furnished himself with all the Ordinance and Endigns sneet for the assume the intention of the company of the company

And when he lought expiation thereGods were appealed and pacified for all that he did. Thus whiles Fabius upon thete occasions:
was kept back, Sempronias was befieged, yea, and by this time affaulted, with fabricks and engins of battery. One mighty great Towre of wood there was crecked againft the Town. There were of Carthagainans slain about soutces hundred; than laying siege unto others. There were of Carthagainans slain about soutces hundred; sort and careless and negligent, searing nothing lessethan a sally out of the Town, and were saddainly at unwares taken and surprised. At the very fame time that the fiege was raifed before Council Time Sempronius furnamed Longua, fought fortunally in Lucania before Grunnentum: with Hanno the Carthaginian: flew more than two thouland of his enemies, lost himself two hundred and eighty men, and went may with 41 enfigns. Hanno thus driven out of the confines of Lucania, retired himself back into the country of the Brutii: And M. Falerim the Pretor, recovered by force from the Hirpins, three Towns that had revolted from the Romans, Vercellius and Sicilius the movers and the Capteins of that Rebellion were cut shorter by the head. More than one thousand captives were fold at the spear in port-sale, to who that would bid most. All the pillage besides was given to the fouldiers, and the army brought back to Cume's. Whiles these things hapned in the Countries of the Lucans and Hirpins, those 5 ships abovefaid (wherein were embarked the Embassadors of the Macedonians and Carthaginians as prifoners) having fee a compass from the upper Adriatick Sea unto the nether Sea of Tuscan, round about (in a manner) all the Sea coast of Italy, hapned to fail along neer the City of Cumes: and being not certainly known whether they were friends or enemies, Gracehus put forth out of his fleet two Pinaces to encounter them. When as by demanding and questioning one with another. I it was once certified unto them, that the Consul was within Cumes, and the ships there arrived in the haven, the prisoners were brought to the presence of the Consul, and all the letters delivered. The Conful after he had read over the letters, both of Philip and Annibal, sealed them up again fure, and fent them by Land unto the Senat of Rome, but commanded the Embaffadors themselves to be conducted thither by Sea. When as both letters, and also the Embassadors were arrived at Rome, in a manner, all in one day, and that (after due examination) words and writings agreed together in one: at the first the LL. of the Senat were pensive and plunged deeply into cares, confidering in how great danger they flood of a new Macedonian war, who were hardly able to endure the Carthaginian. But in conclusion, so far were they off from being utterly dilmayed hereat, and finking under the water, that forthwith they began to treat and de-K bate, how they might begin themselves to war with these enemies first, and so stop them from their entrance into Italy. The captive Embassadors they laid up fast in irons: their train and retinue were fold in open market: and befides the five and twenty fhips, whereof Q. Fulvim Flacem was Admiral, they took order for twenty more to be rigged and decked: which being provided, furnished and shot into the pool affoat, together with those five barks wherein the priloners were conducted: there were 50 fail in all, that looled from Oftia and arrived at Tarentum. Quintus Fulvius had commission to embark the souldiers of Varro, who had been under the leading of L. Apollius the Lieutenant at Tarentum, with his fleet of fifty fail, not only to defend the Sea-coalt of Italy, but also to hearken and have an eye after the Macedonian war: and in case he could learn, that the designment and intent of Philip was sutable to those letters and in- L formations of the Embaffadors, then he should by his letters certifie M. Valerius the Pretor so much; and that leaving with L. Apuftius his Lieutenant the charge of the army, he should go to the Armado at Tarentum, and with all ipeed possible let over into Macedony, and there endeavour to keep Philip play at home within his own realm. As for that money which was tent unto Appins Claudius into Sicily for to be repayed unto King Hiero, it was appointed unto him for the maintenance of his Armado, and managing of the Macedonian war. I his mony was by L. Apu-Strus the Lieutenant brought to Tarentum, and with it, there were sent from Hiero * 200000 Modii of whear, and 100000 of barley.

Whiles these preparations and doings passed at Rome, one ship of those prisoners which were fent to Rome, chanced to fingle it felf from the other, and to escape away to Philip: whereby M he was advertised, that the Embassadors or Commissioners were taken, and the letters intercepted. But he not knowing what covenants had patied between Annibal and his legats, and what answer they should have brought unto him, fent forth another embassage with the same commission. The Embassadors sent unto Annibal, were Heraclitus surnamed Scotinus, Cicero of Berea, and Sofithens of Magnesia. These went to and tro between in lasety, these caried and recaried their errands fortunatly. But the fummer was come and gone, before the King could enter into action, or execute any enterprise. Of lo great moment and importance was the boording of that one ship at the first with the Embassadors, for the deferring of that imminent war intended against the Romans.

When Fabius had passed over the River Vulturnus, after the expiation at length of the prodi-N gious tokens aforesaid, both Consuls together made war about Capua. Fabius by affault won thele Cities, Combulteria, Trebula, and Austicula, which had revolted unto the Carthaginians: and within them he surprised the garison souldiers of Annibal. Many of the Campans likewise were taken prisoners. At Nota (like as in the year before) the Senat held with the Romans, but the Commonalty took part with Annibal, and plotted lecretly, how to murder the Nobility, and to betray the City. But to stop the proceedings of these mischievous designments, Fabius led his army between Capua, and the camp of Annibal upon the hill * Tifata, and fortified himfelf upon the mountain * Vesuvins, in that fort where Claudius had encamped before. From thence he sent M. Marcellus the Vice-Consul with those forces which he had, into Nola, there to lie in garison.

Likewife in Sardinia, T. Manlius the L. Deputy, began to administer those affairs, which had beenforelet, by occasion that Q. Mutius the Pretor was fallen fick, and lay of a long and lingring disease. Manlius after he had drawn the Gallies ashore at Caraleis, and put the mariners and rowers in arms for Land-service, and received of the Pretor his army, was able to make 22000 foot, and 1200 horse. With this power of men of arms and sootmen together, he entred into the enemies countrey, and not far from the camp of Herficora, pitched his tents. Herficora himself was by chance gone then, into the country of the Pellidians (a people of Sardinia) to

A arm the youth there, for the mending of his strength; and lest his son named Hiostus, Ruler over the camp in the mean time. He a lulty hot youth, rashly joyned battail, and quickly was discomfitted and put to flight; thirty thousand Sardinians in that field were flain, and upon 1030 taken priloners alive. The rest of the army first fled stragling afunder over the fields and through the woods; but afterwards, hearing by the voyce that went, how their captain was fled to *Cor- * Cornelo; nus the head City of that region, they retired thither alfo. And furely they had in that one batrail, made an end of all war in Sardinia, but that the Armado of Carthage, under the leading of Aldrubal (which by tempet had been cast upon the Baleare Islands) came in time to entertain the Islanders, in hope to rebel. Manlius, after it was notied abroad, that the Carthaginian fleet R was arrived, retired himself to Caraleis: which gave Hersicora good opportunity and overture to joyn with Asarabal. Who having landed his fouldiers, and fent the thips back again unto Carthare, went forward by the guidance of Hersicora, robbing and spoiling the Lands of the Roman confederats: and had come as far as Caraleis, but that Manlius with an army encountred him upon the way, and reftrained him from to lavish over-running and robbing the country. Ar the first they encamped one against the other not far asunder: afterwards, they began to put out certain bands and companies, and to maintain light skirmishes with variable event, until at last they pitched a fet field, and in full battail fought for the space of 4 hours. The Carthaginians held out conflict a good while, and the victory fail remained doubtful (for the Sardinians were ever used to have the foil) but at last, seeing every quarter full of the Sardinians either lying along C dead, or running away, they also were discomfited: and as they turned their backs and were about to flie, the Romans wheeled about with that wing, wherewith they had defeated the Sardinians, and enclosed them round, and so they fell rather to killing than fighting anylonger. 12000 enemies were there flain of Sardinians and Carthaginianstogether, about 3700 were takenpriloners, and 27 military enigns won. This was a noble and famous battail, memorable especially above all, for taking of these prisoners; namely, Astrubal the L. General, Hanno and Mago, two noble men of Carchage. Mago was of the Barchine house, neer of kin and in bloud to Annibal. Hinno was the follicitor of the Sardinians to rebeilion, and no doubt, the principal Author of that war. Neither, was this field less famous for the overthrow of the chief commanders of the Sardinians : for both Hioffus the ion of Herficora was flain in fight: and also Herficora

D himself, as he fled with a few Horsemen, hearing besides other calamities and losses, of the death of his ion, in the night featon, because he would have no man come between to stay his purposed intent, killed himlest. All the rest escaped to the City * Cornus, as they had done afore, and there * cornus. as in a place of refuge fought to fave themselves. But Manlius following the train of his victory. came against it, and withinfew dayes was matter of it. After this, other Cities also which had revolted, and turned to Hersicora and the Carthaginians; gave hostages, and yeelded by compofiction. And when Manlius had levied of them cercain money for the fouldiers pay and corn likewife, according to the power and ability or trespass of each of them, he led his army back to Caraleis: and there having put the Gallies on the water, and embarked the fouldiers that he had brought with him, he failed to Rome, and recounted unto the LL, of the Senat the utter subduing E of Sardinia. The money he delivered to the Treasurers, the corn to the Ædiles, and the prisoners unto Fulvius the Pretor.

Much about that time, T. Octacilius the Pretor, having failed from Lilybaum into Affrick, and wasted the territory of the Carthaginians, as he was bound from thence and set fail for Sardinias whither Afdrubal as the news went had lately croffed overfrom the Baleare-llands, he met with the Armado returning back into Affrick: and after a skirmish made upon the Sea by his souldiers lightly armed, he took therewith seven Gallies with their oars and mariners: the rest for sear were scattered, as it had been with a tempest, all over the Sea. And it happed about the same time, that Bomilear with certain ompanies of souldiers tent from Carthage for a supply, and forty Elephants, and good fore of victuals came to Locri. For the surprising and setting upon him on p a sudden, Ap. Claudius leading his army in hast, and marching to Messar under a colour of visiting the Province, put over to Locris with the tide. Now was Bomilear passed already from thence into the Brutians country to Hanno, and the men of Locris shut the gates against the Romans. So Appius, after much ado and preparation, having effected nothing, returned back to Meffana, In the same summer, Marcellus made many rodes from Nola (which he held with a garrison) into the Hirpins country, and the Samnits, about Caudium, and made such wast there, with fire and fword, that they in Samnium called into their fresh remembrance the old losses and overthrows which they had received: whereupon there were fent immediately from both nations Embassadors together, unto Annibal, who in this wise delivered their speach unto him. Now are we exposed as it were to be a se prey of one only garrison, and that but a small one, left for the guard and defence of Nota. For, 66 now they overrun all our confines and borders, not by bands and companies in warlike wife, but w cilike Theeves and Robbers, more carelessy and negligently, than if they ranged about for their copleasure in the Roman territory. The only cause is this, because your self make no reckoning to es protect us : and all our own youth (which if they were at home were able to defend us) serveth es under your banner and standard. Hereto Annibal made this answer again, and said; That the Hirpins and Samnits hudled up all at 65 once together : they declared their calamities and losses, they craved aid and succour, and they " made complaint that they were neither guarded by him, nor regarded of him. Whereas they "fhould have first made declaration of their harms: after, fued for help: and last of all, if they "might not obtain, then and not afore they should have complained, that they had befought his "helping hand in vain. Howbeit he promited, that he would not bring his army into the territory, as either of the Hirpins or the Samnits, lest himself also should be chargeable and troublesome unto "them, but into the next quarters belonging to the allies of the Romans: by spoiling and wasting M " whereof, both he would fill his fouldiers hands, and also with the terrour thereof, fet their ene-" mies far enough off from them. And as for the managing of the Roman war, like as the battel st of Thrasimenus, was more noble than that of Trebia; and the field of Canna more memorable, "than that of Thrasmensa: even so would be make the memorial of Canna dim and obscure, in "regard of one greater victory yet, and more renowned than the other. With this answer, and with honourable rewards besides, he dismissed the Embassadors, and gave them their dispatch. And leaving a small guard to keep the Hill Tifata, he marched in person with the rest of his army against Nola. Thither also was Hanno come, out of the country of the Brutii, with the supply that he brought from Carthage, and the Elephants. Where, after Annibal had pitched his Tents not far from the Town, and made diligent enquiry, he found, that the cale was far other-wife, than it was reported by the Embassadors of his associats. For Marcellus bare not him-N felf in any of his actions, to as it might be truly faid, that he blindly committed ought to the hazard of fortune, or rashly adventured upon the enemy. For he never went a plundring without his scouts and espials, without setting strong guards in due places, whereunto he might retire himself in safety: but had a good eye afore him, and a wary regard and heedful forecast, as if he were to encounter with Annibal in person. And even then at that time, when he perceived, that the enemy approached and was coming, he kept his forces within the City: commanding the Senators of Nola, to walk up and down upon the walls, and to survey all over, and espic what the enemies did, or were about. Amongst whom, it happed, that Hanno being come under the very wall, espied Herenvius Bassu, and Herius Petrius, whom he called out to a patle. And when they were gone forth unto him by the permiffion & leave of Marcellus, thus he spake unto them by his interpreter. First, he highly extolled the vertue and fortune of Annibal, debasing and treading, under foot the dignity and Majetty of the people of Rome, growing now old in time, and decaying in force and itrength. "Which if they were (quoth he) on both fides equal, as some-

Herius Nolans. "the captives of the Italian nation and name, they should wish rather to be in league & amity with

A" the Carthaginians, than with the Romans, If both Coff, were with their armies at Nola, they were no more able to match with Annibal, than they were at Canna: much lefs might one Pra-" for with a few raw and new fouldiers hold out and keep Nola against him. And as for the No-"lans themselves, it concerned them much more than it did Annibal, to consider, whether he " should win Nota by force, or enter upon it by surrender and composition. For to be Lordtherof "he made no doubt, hke as he was Matier already of Capua and Nuceria but what odds and diffe-" rence there is between the state of Capua and of Nuccria, the Nolans know best themselves, who "are feated (as it were) in the mid way between both. To this motion Herennius Baffus framed his answer in this fort. "For many years a ready there hath been The solwer of "continual amity between the people of Rome and Nota, and neither of both to this day bath Herennius to " repented therof, As for the Nolans themselves if they had been disposed to turn with the wind. Hanne, "and to change their faith and alleageance, together with their fortune, they would have done it "long before this: for now it was too late to fart & alter. If they had minded to yield themselves "unto Annibal they would never have fent for a garrifon or Romans: but fince they were now "come to project and defend them, they had imparted & come unicated all their flate with them c already and would take such part as they follong as they had an hour to live. This emparl put Annibal clean befides all hope of gaining Nola by treaton. Therefore he beleaguered the town on every fide, and invested it round about like a garland, to the end, that in one initiant he might give the affault on every part of the walls. When Marcellus law him under the walls he for his people first in battel aray within the gate and then with a great noise and tunnalt he suddenly fallied our. At their first shock and onset divers of the enemies were beaten down and flain: but after that, they ranfrom all parts to battel, and were come together with equali forces, the fight began to be hot and sharp, and a memorable conslict it had been and few like it, but that it raised and poured down to falt, and with to many florms and tempetts, that it parted both the battels, and flaid the fight. So for that day, having with that small skirmish kindled their courages, and set their blond in D hear, they retired back, the Romans within the City, and the Carthaginians to their Camp, Howbeit of the Carthaginians there were flain upon the first fally and charge given, not above thirty. and of the Romans not one man. This tempessuous shower of rain lasted all night long, and continued Hill, and never gave over untill nine of the clock before noon the next day. And therefore, albeit they were tharp fet, and their fingers it ched on both fides to be a fighting, yet for that day they kept within their hold and frength. So the third day Annibal fent out certain companies into the territory about Nolas, for to forrage and fetch in booties: which, so soon as Marcellus understood he presently set his men in array, and entred the field, neither was Annibal for his part behind. Now there was a mile distance, or very near between the City and the enemies Camp. In this space between (for all about Nola is plain and champian) they encountred and joyned battel. E The shout that they set up on both sides, reclaimed and caused to return unto the sight already begun the nearest of those cohorts and bands which were gone aforraging into the country. The men of Nola likewife came unto the Romans, and mer ded their battel: whom Marcellas commended for their forwardness, and gave them in charge to abide in the rereward to help as occation ferved and to carry forth of the skirmish those that were hurt and wounded, and to forbear fight in any case, unless they had a fignall and token given them by him. The fight was doubtfull, for both the Generals gave encouragement effectually, and also the souldiers did their best, and fought right manfully? Marcellus was earnest with his men to press hard and charge still upon their enemies, whom they had defeated not three daies ago, who not many daies past were put to flight, and driven from Cumes, and who the year before were beaten from Nol a under his con-

r duct by other fouldiers faying," That they were not all there in the field but many of them gone. The freech of " ranging abroad in the country, for to hale booties, and get prizes. "Adding withall that Capita was another Canna unto Annibal: there died his warlitte prowefs, G"there, loft he his military discipline; there was the glorious time of former discs burled; there "the hope of future time tor ever suppressed and stifled. As Marcellus by reproving the leand such like things in his enamies, animated his own fouldiers: so Annibal rebuked his men with more harp words and bitter checks. "I know thele to be (quoth he) the lame arms and weapons," Annibal to his

Ye that were wont, being few in number, to vanquish many are ye now, being many in number, hardly able to withitand and abide the violence of a few? Ye spake big, and gave out great brags and "proud words, that if any man would lead you you would win Rome, that you would. Behold, "now a smaller piece of service. Here I would have you prove your strength, and make triall of r "vour valour. Let us fee now, win me Nola, a City scituate in the Champian, on a plain, defended neither with sea nor river. But nothing availed either his chearfull words, or his checking rebukes, to encourage and confirm their hearts. For the Carthaginians being forced on every fide to retreat whiles the Romans grew more and more animated, not only through the comfortable freeches of their own Captains, but also the Nolans themselves, who with their loud showting intoken of their love and affection, enkindled their courages to hot fight) turned their backs, and were driven into their hold. And when the Romans were denrous to affail the fame, Marcellus reconducted them to Nola, with great joy and congratulation even of the Com. K mons there, who before, were more enclined and affected to the Carthaginians. There were of the enemies flainthat day above one thousand, fixteen hundred were take prisoners, nineteen military enfigns won, two Elephants gotten alive, and foure flain in the conflict. Of Rom ins there were not killed all out one thousand. The morrow after they spent (upon a truce concluded) in burying the dead that were flain on both fides. Of the ipous of the enemies Marcellus made a great fire upon a vow pronounced unto Vulcan. On the third day, 1272 horsemen of Numidians and Spaniards, one with another (upon some spleen and anger Theleeve. or elie for hope of more liberall entertainment and commodious gain) fled from Annibal and turned to M'treellus: whose valiant and faithfull service stood the Romans in very good flead oftentimes during that war. And after the war was ended, the Spaniards in Spana, and t the Numidians in Affrick, in reward of their vertue and prowess, were endued with fair lands and large possessions. Quintus Fabius fo foon as he heard that Annibal had taken his way into Apalia, conveyed all the corn from Nola and Naples into his Camp, which he had pitched above Sneffula: and having well fortified the hold, and left there a sufficient garrison to guard the place for that winter time, removed himself nearer to Capua, and there encamped: and so walled the Campan Territory with fire and sword, that the Campans little trusting jutheir own forces, were constrained to iffue forth of their gates, and fortifie themselves in Camp before the City, in the open M plain. Six thousand they were in all. Their footmen were weak and not for service: their horsemen were far better and more able: so that oftentimes they charged their enemies with their horse, and provoked them to fight. Among many brave men of arms that the Campans had, one Tubellus, furnamed Turea, a Citizen of Capua, was the worthieft and best horseman of them all, by many degrees: infomuch, as when he served under the Romans, Claudius Affellus ouly, a Citizen of Rome, was able to match him in glory of good horsemanship and horse service. This Tanres when he had ridden all about the troops of his enemies, casting his eye every way to see if he could epy Claudius Afelius, enquired at length closely, after filencemade, where about he was, and made this challenge unto him, That leeing he was wont in words to contend with him for valour and prowels, he should now determine the question by the spear-point and N dint of fword, and either be de poiled of his glorious armour, if he were overcome, or else gain the same with the victory. Which defiance being brought into the Campto Afellus his ears, he made no more to do, but went presently to the Consul, to know whether he might with his good leave and licence out of his rank fight extraordinarily with his enemy that bad him combar. After leave obtained, he armed himself immediatly, mounted on horseback, and rode before the enemies corps de guard, oftentimes calling upon Taurea by name, and bidding him come forth to encounter when oever he durft. Now were the Romans by this time gone forth of the Camp in great number to behold this combat: the men of Capua likewife filled not only the rampier of their hold but also the walls of the City to see this fight. When as they had made some goodly flourish afore hand with brave swords and shout speeches, to set out the action: they let spear in rest, and put spurs to horse, and justled together amain. Afterwards, having gotten the liberty of the ground they dallied one with another, trifling out the time, and making along peece of work of it, without giving or taking wound. Then quoth the Campan Knight to the Roman, This will be but a fight of horles, and not of horlemen, unless we ride out of the open plain ground here into this hollow way, where having no such scope to prick out at large, we shall soon come to hand gripes, and close together. The word was not so soon spoken, but Claudius turned his horse head, and rode into the foresaid way. But Taurea a stouter

A champion in word than deed: Oh take beed of all things (quoth he) how you ride a gelding in a elirch: Which grew afterwards to a by-word affed among the country people. Claudius after he had rode in and out, up and down, a long time in the lane, and never met with his enemy, returand again into the open plain: and rating the cowardice of his enemy, with great joy and gratulasion; rodeback as conquerourinco the Camp. Some Annals and Chronicles do record and add to this combattof horsemen, a strange and wonderful thing (no doubt) if it be true, as by the common opinion it is reputed no less: namely, that when Taurea fled back into the City, Clandistribultowed hard after him in chace, enered with him at one gate flanding open, and rode out clearar the other unhurt, to the great wonder and altonishment of the enemies. Upon this the B standing Camps were equiet on both sides: and the Cos. removed backward farther off from the City that the men of Capua might low their grounds: neither did he any harm unto their fields. before the corn was come up and fo well grown, that the blade theteof yielded good forrage and food for the horses; which he gathered and brought into the standing Camp and hold of Clinedini above Suessidia, and there he built winter harbors for to make his abode. And he gave order to M.C. adjust the Vice-Consult to keep still at Nilaa competent garrison for defence of the City; and to discharge the rest of the foundiers, and send them to Rome, that they should neither be cumbrous to their Allies, nor chargeable to the Common-weal, Tib. Gracchus alio whi.es he led his Legions from Cumes into Apulia to Luceria, fent M. Valerius the Prator from then e to Brundustum, with that army which he had at Luceria, commanding him to keep the lea-coast of the C Salentines Country, and to provide for all things necessary against Philip and the Macedonian

In the end of this fummer, wherein these acts were atchieved whereof I have written, there came'a packet of Letters from P. and Cornel, Scipios, importing how great and how fortunate exploits they had performed in Spain: but there wanted money for pay: and apparell and corn to serve both souldiers and mariners. And albeitall thesethings were away yet as concerning money if the City Chamber and common Treasure were not stored, they would make some shift to raile it of the spaniards : but for all the relt, needs it must be sent from Rome for otherwise neither could they keep the Army together nor hold the Province in their allegeance. When the letters were read there was no man there but acknowledged that they wrote a truth, and demann ded that which was reasonable, Burthey considered withall, what great armies both on land and at sea they maintained: and what a mighty Armadathey must prepare and set out anew, in case the Macedomian war went forward. Assfor Sicily and Sardinia, which before the wars began, paid tribute, were fearce able to find and keep the garrisons, that lay therefor the guard of the Provinces: and that they were to crust upon their own revenues and tribute for the maintenance of the charge they were at. But as the number of them that paid rent and conferred tribute, was greatly diminished by so great overthrows of the armies, both at the pool Thrasymenus, and also at Came; to those few that remained if they were burdened with many exactions and payments, should be plagued and undone another way, therfore it was concluded, that unless the Commonweal maintained not her felf by her credit and borrowing money, the were not able to be fulfai-E ned by her own wealth and riches, So it was agreed, That Fulvius the Prætor must needs affemble all the people together, and lay abroad and declare unto them the necessity and exigent that the Common-weal was driven unto, and to exhort all them that had enriched themselves and encreated their livings, by renting and taking to farm the revenues and commodities of the City, should now do good to the Commonweal for a time, by which they were grown to that wealth, and undertake the provision at a price, and furnish the army in Spain, with all necessaries thereto belonging, to becontented and paid therefore with the first, out of the common Chest, when it were flored with money. Thus the Prætor made declaration of these matters in the open alfembly of the people, and withall determined and fet down a certain day, whereupon he minded to put forththe fouldiers liveries and apparel, and corn to be provided for the Spanish Army, F and all things else requisite for the mariners. When the day was come, there presented themselves unto him three companies of nineteen men, for to take this bargain. Who made two requests and demands, the one, that for that three years next ensuing, there should be no other Publicans or farmers of the City: the other, that whatfoever they shipped, the Common-weal would make good against all force of enemy, or violence of tempest. Both being granted, they took upon them the marter, and so the Gommon-weal was served by the money of private persons. This was the demeanor, this was the loving affection to their country, that went through all degrees of men (as it were) after one fort and manner. And like as they undertook with great courage to ferve thearmy to with fingular fidelity they performed every thing, in such fort, as there was nothing at all wanting, no more than if they had been maintained from a rich trea-G luty, as in times past. At what time as this provision came, the town of * Illiturgi was assailed * Aldea et ris. by Isdrubal, Maro, and Amilear the son of Bomilear, because it revolted unto the Ro- or Andular el

Amidft these three severall Camps of the enemies, the two Scipios passed into the City of their Allies, that made resistance against, and with great loss of men; and brought corn with them, whereof there was great want: and after they had encouraged and exhibited the townsmen, that with the same resolution they would defend the walls as they had seen the Roman army to fight for them and in their quarrell: they led forth their power to give an affault upon the greatest Camp, whereof Afarubat was the General. Thither also repaired the two Caps, years and two Armies of the Carthaginians, when they saw that the whole triall of thematter was there to be determined, and to they issued out of their tents and sought. ThreeGroet housand enemies were that day in field and about 16000 Romans; and yet the victory went to clear with the Romans, that they slew more of their enemies than they were in number themielves, took prisoners more than three thousand men, and not many under a thousand horse; and withal won 60 military enisgns wanting one, and killed five Elephants in the batter: and to conclude, were Lords that day of three Camps. After that the siege was raised from Islumgs, the Carthaginian armies were led to the assair of the town "Incibility, having their companies made up and impplied again out of the Province, sa being a nation of all others most definous and eager of war, I so there be hope of pillage or good recompence) and at that time especially full of young and lastymen. There were stain above thirteen thousand enemies, and more than 3000 taken pritioners, besides two and forty military ensigns, and nine Elephants. Then in a manner all the Cities of Spantesoleted to the Romans. And far greater exploits were that summer performed in Spain, than in Islati.

Anno was not so soon returned out of Campane, into the country of the Brutii, but by their help and guidance he follicited to rebellion the Greek Cities which continued the more willing yin league and alliance with the Romans, because they saw that the Benti, whom they both hated and feared fided with the Carthaginians. And first he affaied and N went in hand with Rhegium, where he spent certain daies to little or nopurpose. In this mean time, the Inhabitants of Loeri were bulie in carrying away with great halle the corn, wood and fewel and all things elle, necessary for the use of man, out of the country into the City; because they would leave nothing or the enemy to prey upon. And daily more and more of them went out of the gates by heaps, to as at last there was no more left in the City, than those that were compelled to repair the breaches of the walls and the gates, and to bring into the turrets and bulwarks flore of darts and other shot. Against this multitude and consused mixture of all ages, sexes, and degrees, ranging over the fields, whereof most were altogether unarmed, Amilear the Carthagivian sent out his Cavalry, giving them direction, and charging them to hurt no person. These horsemen opposed their troops between them and home, only to exclude them out of the City. when they were l'attered one from another in flight. The General himself in perfenencamped on a high ground, from whence he might view the country and the City. And gave commandment to a cohort of the Brutii to approach the walls to call forth the principal Citizens of Lori to parl, and by making promise of Annibal his friendship, to perswade and exhort them to yield up the town. At the first they gave no credit at all unto the Brutis, whatsoever they said; Butafterwards, when they discovered Hanno and the Carthaginians upon the hils, and heard by some

A few of their own Citizens that were fled back & escaped, how all the rest of the multitude were fain within danger of the enemies, they made answer, that they would confer and consult theremoon with the body of the people. So immediatly they were affembled together. The most light headed persons were desirous of a change and new alliance: they also, whose kinssolk and friends were by the enemy intercepted and kept out of the City, had their minds engaged and bound fure enough, as if they had put in hostages; and some few who were well affected inwardly in heart. & liked of constancy and true loyalty, yet durst not be known thereof, and shew themselves to stand to it: fo as, they all agreed in outward appearance, to furrender themselves to the Carthaginians. And after they had closely conveigned into the haven, and embarked L. Atilius the Captain of the B garrison, and all the Roman souldiers that served under him to the end, that they might be transported to Rhegium, they received Amilear and the Carthaginians into the City, with this condition that prelently there should be concluded a league upon equals and indifferent covenants and capitulations between them. But the promite in this behalf (when they had once yielded themfelves) was nothing well performed: whiles Amilear charged the Lo. rians, with fraudulent difmissing and letting go the Romans : and they again alleaged for their excuse, that they fled away, and made an escape. The horsemen also sollowed hard in chase by land, if haply either the tide might cause the ships to stay in the current within the straight, or drive them a land. But those whom they purfued they could not overtake: marry, other thips they elpied croffing the fireights from Meffana to Rhegium. Roman fouldiers they were fent from Claudius the Prator, to lie in C garrison there, and to keep the town. Whereupon they presently departed from Megium.

As for the Citizens of Locri, they had peace granted them by express order and direction from Annibal upon these conditions: Imprimis, That they might live free under their own laws: Item, That both the City and the haven should remain still in the hands of the Locrians. The substance of the covenant refted and was established upon these terms. That the Carthaginians and Locrians should aid and assist one another mutually, both in peace and war, So the Carthaginians retired from the flreights not with flanding the muttering and mutmuring of the Brutit, because they had left Rhogium and Locri untouched, which two Cities they made full account to have facked and rifled. And therefore they of themselves having levied and put in arms a power of fifteen thouland of their own youth, marched forward to affail Croton, a Grecian City likewife, and fean ted upon the sea. Affuring themselves, much to better their estate, if they could be possessed of a port and sea-town, senced with strong wals and Bulwarks. This only troubled and perplexed their minds, that they durft not but fend unto the Carthaginians for aid: fearing left they might teem to have entred into action and war, without regard of the common good of their confederats, if they called them not: and doubting besides, that if the General of the Carthaginians should prove again, rather anarbitrator of peace, than a coadjutor in war, they should fight in vain against the liberty of Croton, as they had done before against the City of Locri, Whereupon they thought best to send Embassadors unto Annibal for his warrant, and to be secured from him, that if Croton were recovered by the Brutians, it should be subject unto them. Annibal made answer, that this matter required consultation of men present with them in place, and therefore E he put them over to Hanno, from whom they received no certain answer to trust unto. For willing they were not, that a noble and rich City as it was, should be spoiled: and besides they were in good hope, that in case the Brutians should assail it, and the Carthaginians all the while not teen, either to allow or help them in their enverprize, the Citizens would the more willingly revolt unto them. The Inhabitants within Groton were not of one mind, and affected alike. For there was one malady that had infected all the Cities of Iealy, namely, the diffention between the Commons and the Nobles. The Senators inclined to the Romans, the Commoners on the other fide took part with the Carthaginians. This division within the City, the Bruit were by a fueitive runaway advertised of in these terms: namely, that Aristomachia, the ring-leader and head of the Commons, minded to betray the City: that it was a wide, vafte, and defolate town taking a F great arcuit of ground and all the walls being decaied and in fundry places broken down, the Senators and the Commonskept their severall guards and watches in fundry quarters far asunder, And look(quoth he) where the Commons ward, there ye may enter at your pleasure. Upon this intelligence and direction given by the fugitive, the Bruin environed the City round about and being let in by the Commons at the first assault were masters of all places, saving the Castle. The Nobles held that piece foreseeing what might happen, and therefore provided themselves of a sure refuge. Thither fled Aristomachus also, pretending that he meant to deliver the City to the Carthaginians, and not to the Brutii. Now this City Croton had a wall (before Pyrrhus coming into Italy) twelve miles in compass; but after it was laid waste by that war scarce the one half of the town was inhabited. The river that was wont to run through the midit of the town passed now G along the wals without those streets where the houses stood thick and well peopled, far from the Sixmiles without the town there flood a noble Temple of Lacinia Juno, more fenowned than the City it felf, as being honoured with great religion and devotion of all the Cities and nations thereabout. A facred grove there was in that place compaffed with a thick wood, of tall fit trees, having in the midft within it divers pleasant and fruitfull pastures, wherein were fed beafts confectated unto the goddess, of all fores, without any keeper and pastor. And albeit the cattell went forth in the morning by herds and flocks of their own kind, severed by themselves, yet at night they used to return back again to their own pens and stalls, without harm received either by the wait laying of wild and ravenous beafts, or by deceitfull fraud of men. Great encrease therefore it and much commodity accrued by shole catted, infomuch as thereof was made a maffie Column or pillar of beaten gold, and confectated in that place, fo as the Temple was famous, as well for riches, as holines and devotion. And many times it falleth out, that to fuch notable places there are attributed fome fit ange miracles, For the report goeth, that there flandeth an altar in the very porch of the Temple, the assessing whereupon no wind was ever known to blow away.

But to return to Croton. The Caltle thereof on the one fide standeth upon the fea, on the other fide it bendeth and looketh toward the land. Defended in times past it was only by the natural fituation of the ground, but afterwards fortified also with a wall ; on that part whereas Dionifius the Tyrant of Sicily, having gained the back rocks and cliffs behind, by craft and guile sometime . won it. This Callle at that time supposed to be strong and safe enough, the Nobles seized and kept, notwithstanding the Brutii and their own Commons besieged them. At length the Brutii seeing the Castle impregnable, by all the forces and assaults that they could make of themselves, were driven of necessity to crave aid of Hanno. Who having affaied to draw and urge the Crotoniats to yield, upon these conditions, To suffer a Colony of the Bruis thither to be brought, and there planted; and that thereby a City lying so waste and desolate, might be replenished and peopled again as in ancient time : could not move and perswade any one of them all, but Aristomachus. For all behides, protested and said, they would die before they would be intermingled with the Brutii, to change their own rites and manner of life, their customes, their laws, and within a while their language also for others that were strange and forrain. Ar stomachus alone, seeing that he k could not prevail neither by perswasions to induce them to yield, nor find any means to betray the Cafile like as he had done the town before, fled away to Hanno, Shortly after, certain Embaffadors from Locre, by the licence and permission of Hanno, entred the Castle, and perswaded them to be content for to be translated to Locri, rather than to abide and stand out the extremity: saying that they had fent Embaffadors already to that intent unto Annibal, and had got a grant at his hands, that they might to do. So they abandoned Croton, and the Crotoniats were brought down to the iea side and embarked, and the whole multitude departed to Locri.

In Applies the very winter feafon was not quiet between the Romans and Amilial, Sempronius the Conful wintred at Luceria, and Annihal not far from him in Appl: and as they could fay opportunity, or take their vantage, of the one fide or the other, there passed forme light skirmishes between them. But the Romans had alwaies the better, and every day more than other, became more wary and secured from all trains and deceitful stares of the enemy.

In Sieils the Romans found a great change, and all out of order, by reason that King Hiero was dead and the Crown translated to his Nephew, or sons son, Hieronymus: being yet a child not like to use his own liberty with moderation, and much less to sway the Kingdom and Scepter with difference. His guardians and friends gladly entertained the protection and government of fuch a nature, and were ready enough to plunge him headlong into all vice and wickedness. Which King Hiero foreleeing, was willing (by report) in his latter daies, to have left Syracufa free and at liberty, to the end that so noble a kingdom, acquired and established by good means, should not under the Lordly dominion of a child to the great obloquy and shame of the world, be ruinate and come to nought. But his daughters with tooth and nail crofted this his defignment, and made full reckoning, that the child should only bear the name of a King, but the government of the whole State should wholly rest in them and their husbands, Andronodorus and Zoilus: who were the principall guardians, left to overfee the young Prince. And an easie matter it was not for an aged man now fourtoore years old and ten, fo hardly laid at day and night, by the fair speeches, and feminine flatteries of his daughters, to keep his mind free, and to apply and convert it to intend private regards, and the publike confideration of the State, " And therefore he left fifteen tu-" tors to overfee and governthe child, whom he befought upon his death-bead, even when he "was going out of this world, to maintain entire and unipotted, the faithfuli alleageance to the "Romans, which he had kept and observed inviolate for the space of fifty years; and taket to N " their helping hand willingly, to direct the young Prince above all, to tread in his steps, and to "follow that discipline wherein he had been nurtured and taught. After he had given this charge, and yielded up his breath, the guardians came abroad brought forth the Kings last will and testament, and shewed the young Prince in the open assembly of the people and well near sitteen years of age he was.) Where some few, such as were bestowed here of purpose within the press of the affembly for to shout and shew testimony of their joy and good liking, approved with open voice, and allowed the Kings will: whereas all the rest fored as Orphans in a City bereaved of their King and (as it were) become fatherless, and feared all things that might enfue. The King was interred and his funerals folemnized, with the love and kind affection of his people and subjects, more than with any fludious care and diligence of his own friends that were nearest to him. After this, Andronodorus removed from about the Prince all other guardians but himfelf, giving out oftentimes that H.ero rymus was past a child, and able to govern of himself as King. Thus by depoing the Protectorship, which was common to him and many others, he took upon him and offerped the power and authority of themall. Hard it was even for a right good King and well governed, that should succeed after Hiere, to find favour and win grace among the Syracusame to heartily they affected and loved King Hiero. But Hieronymus, as if he had been willing and defirous, that by his vicious and wicked life, they should have a great miss of his grandsther, and wish again for him; at the very first sight, when he shewed himself abroad in open place, declared unto the world, what difference and great odds there was. For they who so many years together had never feen Hiero, nor his fon Gelo, either in habit of apparel, or in any other ornaments and port, differing from all other Citizens, now beheld him in his purple robes, with his regall Crown and Diadem, attended with his guard and train of armed penfioners: yea, and otherwhile after the manner of Denis the Tyrant riding forth of his Court and Palace, in a Chariot drawn with four white fleeds. This proud pomp and flately array was accompanied and fuited with semblable qualities and conditions. He contemned and despised all men: he scorned most proudly to give audience to humble suppliants; and fent them away with reproachful terms B and raunts. And not only strangers, but also his very guardians hardly might have access unto him: and to conclude, his lutts and delights whereunto he gave himfelf, were new and strange: his cruelty that he exercised outragious and inhumane. So dread and terrible was he to all, that fome of his Tutors, either by making themselves away, or by voluntary exile were driven to prevent and a void the danger of cruell torments. Of whom three on'y, who alone had more familiar recourse into the Court, to wit, Andronodorns and Zailm, the ions in law of King Hiero, that had married his daughters, and one Thrafo, had little or no ear given unto them in other marters; but whiles two of them drew toward the Carthaginians, and Thrafe to the Roman alliance: with their arguing debating and dispute, they otherwhile turned the mind of the young King to hearken and give audience to their opinions. Now it hapned that there was a conspiracy inten-C ded against the life and perion of the Tyrant, and the same detected by one Calo, the companion and playfellow of Hieronymus, and of the same age: one who ever from his childhood had been familiarly acquainted with him, and inward to all his fecrets. This revealer of the conspiracy, could appeach and nominate all the compirators, only Theodorus, by whom himself was made privy to the treaton, and follicited to be a complice therein. The party was apprehended incontinently, and delivered unto Andronodorus to be tortured; Who at the first without delay, confessed himself to be guilty, but concealed all the rest that were accessories. At the last, when he had been torn mangled, and diffmembred, with most dolorous torments, and intolerable for any man to endure: pretending and making femblance that he could abide no longer pains; disclosed not for all this the guilty perions indeed, but accused the innocent, and said failly, that Thrase was n the first deviter of the wholeplor: and unless they had born themselves, and relied upon so mighty an head, to fet them on work, they would never have attempted to dangerous an enterprise. He appeached also some other of the Tyrant his guard and houshold servants and daily waiters: even such as came into his mind during the time of his dolours and paines, and whom amidst his groans he imagined to be such, as whose lives might be best spared, and deaths least lamented. The naming of Thraso especially made the Tyrant to believe, that the detection sounded to be a very truth indeed: whereupon the man was immediatly led to execution and put to death; and the other innocents, as clear as himfelf, tafted of the fame cup, and fuffered with him for company. As for the conspirators themselves, albeit one of their fellows was a long whileput to bitter and extream torture, there was not one of them that either hid his head or made an E escape : so assured confidence had they in the resolute constancy and faithfull promise of Theodorus. and such power and strength had Theodorus himself to keep close the secrets committed unto him. Now when Thraso was once dispatched out of the way, who only was the means to hold them in and to bind them to their alliance and alleageance to the Romans then forthwith they began openly to encline to rebellion, and fent as Embassadors for the same purpose, two noble vouno Gentlemen, Hippocrates and Epicides unto Annibal; From whom also they were sent back again in Embaffage. These were both born at Carthage, but descended in bloud from the Syracusians by their grandfather, that was from thence banished and were themselves by the mothers side meer Carthaginians. By entercourse of these two Embassadours, a League was concluded between Annibal and the Tyrant of Syracufe. And Annibal was content that they should abide still as Leigers When Appius Claudius the Prætor and Lord Deputy of the Province of Sicily heard these news. he addressed straight waies Embassadors unto Hieronymus: who saving, that they were come to renew the alliance which they had with his grandfather, had fcornful audience given them to deliver their message, and were dismissed and sent away by Hieronymus with a frump, demanding of them by way of a coff," How they had feed at the battel of Canna. For I can hardly believe "(quoth he) that all is true which the Embaffadors report of that field: and I would gladly "know the certain truth & thereupon deliberate and take counsel, which side I were best to take, The Roman Embaffadors faid, they would repair again unto him when he could begin once to give audience with gravity and in good earnest to their embassige: and io after they had warned & admonished, rather than praied and entreated him, not to change, but to stand to the first cove-Gnant and promises, they departed. Then Hieronymus sent his Legates to Carthage, for to confirm the League with the Carthaginians, according to the alliance and amity made with Annibal. In which it was capitulate and covenanted, that when they had expelled the Romans out of Sicily (which would shortly come to pais, in case they sent thither ships and a power of men) the river Himera, which (as it were) divided the Island in the midst, should confine and limit, both the Syracusian kingdom and the dominion of the Carthaginians. After this, being puffed up with the fair flattering speeches of such as were about him, who suggested unto him, to remember and call to mind that not only King Hiero was his grandfather, but also King Pirrbus by the mothers fide:

ha fent Embassadors unto the Carthaginians, to give them from him to understand, That he dee-

medit right and meet, that all Sicily wholly should lie unto his dominion: and that the Empire's of Italy only, belonged properly to the Carthaginian people to acquire and conquer. This levity and vain glorious humour they neither wondred at as a ftrange thing in a giddy-brained young man; nor yet greatly blamed and found fault with, follong as they might effrance him wholly and alienate him altogether from the friendship of the Romans. But all things in him turned to his overthrow and utter confusion. For whiles Hippogrates and Epicides were tent afore with two thouland fouldiers for to found and follicit the Cities rebellion, that were held by the garrifons of the Romans: and himfelf in person entred the country of the Leontins, with all the rest of the forces, which amounted to fifteen thousand foot and horse together: certain conspirators, who chanced all to be his own fouldiers, and bare arms under him, possessed themselves of a vake 1 house standing over a narrow lane through which the King was wont to go down into the market place of the City : there when other stood armed and well appointed, and waiting when the King should pass by, one of the conspirators (whose name was Indigemines) had given him in charge because he was one of the squires of the Kings body, when the King approached near unto the door of the faid house, to find some occasion or other, in that straight passage, to stay the troop and train that followed behind. And so he effected indeed, and put in execution, as it was agreed and contrived. For Indigenines, lift up his foot, making as though he would loofe and flack a firaight knot of his sho-latcher, which hindring his going, whereby he flaid the company that followed after, follow that the King passing by alone without his guard of armed men about him, was affaulted mean while, and recieved fundry flabs and wounds, before they could K come to refeue and fave him. Hereupon arofe an outcry and tumult, and divers of the guard let flie at Indigemines, who by this time was ready to oppose himself, and to award all venues: howbeit he was hurt only in two places, and so cscaped. The guard seeing the King there lying dead. fled away as they could. The murtherers, some of them betook themselves into the market-place unto the multitude, that rejoiced for the recovery of their freedom: others repaired to Syrucule, to intercept and prevent the defignments of Andronodorus, and other favourits and followers of the late King.

Whiles things flood in these uncertain and doubtful terms, Appius Claudius foreseeing war . like to enfue, and that very frortly, addressed his letters unto the Senat of Rome, certifying them that Sic.ly enclined already, and was at hand to fide with the people of Carthage and with Ami- L bal. Himself in the mean time bent all his forces toward the frontiers of the Province and confines of that Kingdom, to withfland and hinder all the proceedings and enterprises of the Syra-

In the end of that year, Q. Fabins, by order from the Senate, fortified Pincoli, a town of merchandile, and which in time of wars began to be much reforted unto and frequented, and there he placed a garrison. From whence as he was in his journey toward Rome against the grand Election of Magistrates, he proclaimed the solemn assembly of the people for that purpose to be the next Comitiall day that followed upon his arrivall thither: and to it fell out, that he went along the City fide immediatly upon his journey, and came down into Mars field before he entred the City, Upon which day when it hapned that the Century of the younger fort was drawn out by M lot, and nad the prerogative, and by their voices nominated T. Octacilius, and M. Emylius Regillus for Confule, then Q. Fabius after filence made, role up, and delivered this or fuch like speech. of Fibius to "If either we had peace in Italy, or war at least wife with those enemies, with whom if we dealt " neither negligently or unadvitedly, the matter were not much nor importing great hazard and "danger: I would think, that who foever diffurbed and croffed your favours and free affections "which we bring hither with you into this folemn place of affembly to bestow honours and dig-"nities upon whom ye please had but small and no regard of your liberty and freedom, But since "that in this war and with this enemy never any General of ours faulted in the managing of his "affairs, but it coil us dear, and we had some great soil and overthrow; it behoveth you, that with what mind and carefull regard ye enter the field to combat in your armour, in the same yell " should come hither into this Mars field in your gowns, and so proceed by your suffrages to e'electyour Confus: and that every one of you should thus say to himself, I am to nominatea "Conful to match with General Annital, No longer fince, than this very year, when as before "Copia, Jubellius Taurea, the bravest horseman and Cavalier of all the Campans defied the Ro-"mans, and challenged them to fight man to man, Afellus Claudius, the noblest Knight of all the "Romans, and best man at arms, was chosen to encounter him. Now foratmuch as enough hath been taid, what manner "of Confuls ve ought to create: it remaineth to peak fomewhat of them, whom the prerogative Century to highly favoureth, and is formuch affected unto. As for M. Empling Revillag he "is the Flamin of Quirinus, whom neither we may take from his ministry of Sacrifice, nor yet "retain and keep him still but we shal neglect either the service of the gods, or the due care and "repard of the wars. Bur "your favours and good turns shewed both to me, and also to my ancestors, are not of so small "account and reckoning, but that I ought to prefer the Common-weal before all private re-B" gards and alliances whatfoever. Every mariner, yea, and any passenger is able to steer and rule "a Ship in a calm water : but when a bioftering tempelt is up, and the veffel toffed in a troubled "furging lea, and carried away with violent force of the winds, then there had need to be a man "indeed, and a skillul Pilot to fit at the flern, and to guide the helm. We fail not now in a fill "and quiet fea: but we have been drenched, and in a manner drowned, with some florms alreaof dy and therefore we ought to have exceeding great care and be well advised atorehand, whom "we have to be the steers man. In a matter of less consequence and importance, we have made "triall, O T. Offacileus, of your knowledge and fervice: and you have not given us ver loggood "proof of your vertue and prowels therein, that we should put you in trust with the managing "of greater affairs. A Navy whereof you were Admiral, we rigged and trimmed to your hands C" this year for three causes: first, to annoy and spoil the sea-coast of Affrick: secondly to defend " and keep to our behoof the ports and havens of Italy: last of all, and above all, to empeach and " flay all supplies and new succours, together with money munition, and victuall, for being trans-"ported unto Annibal from Carthage. If Octacilius have performed, I fay not all these things, but in any one quit himself well to the good and benefit of the State, Elect him Consul hard-"ly, and good leave have you. But if it appear, that while you had the rule of the Armada, all "things (that a man would have) passed out of the country unto Annibal, with as great fafety " and security as if the seas had been open and void of enemies . If , I say, the sea coast of Italy " hath all this year been more in danger, and subject to sustain harm, than that of Affrick: what "reason can you alledge, wherefore the people of Rome should choose you above all others, to D" oppose as Captain, to confront their enemy Annibal. If you were Consul in place already, we "would judge it requifite and good to nominate and create a Dictator, according to the exam-" ple of our forefathers : neither could you take fouff or be offended; that there should be found in the City of Rome abetter warrior, and more sufficient than your self. And surely it concerneth "no man more than you, O Octacilias, to fee that there be not imposed a burden upon your "shoulders under which you should fail and fall down right. Wherefore I advise and exhort you all, as much as possibly I can, in electing of Confuls this day, to carry that mind, and afe that care-"full providence as ye would, in case ye were standing armed in battel array; and to choose our of hand two Generall Captains under whole conduct and government ve should presently te fight a field: and make choice of fuch Confuls, unto whom our children were to take the oath Es of allegeance: at whole commandment, they shou deome and assemble together, and under "whole charge and protection they might willingly erve as fouldiers. The pool Thrafymenus, the " plain before Canna, are heavy examples for us to remember : but yet they serve for good prece-"dents unto us to teach us how to avoid the like mif hief another time. So the prerogative Century of the younger and puny fort, was called again to a new februiny, and to give their voices again. Whereat when T.Ottacilius began to cry out aloud and say very stoutly, that Fabius his drift was to continue Conful fill, and therewith grew to be clamorous and troublesome to the affembly: the Conful commanded the Lictors to go unto him, and to lay hold upon him. And foraimuch as yet he had not entred into the City, but came down (traight waies into the Mars field prefently from his journey, he put them in mind, that the knitches of the rods together with the axes F within them should be born before him. And in the mean time the prerogative Century began afresh to give their voices: and by it were nominated Consuls Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Marcellus the third time : and all the Centuries befides without any jarring and variance elected the very same. One of the former Prators likewise was chosen again namely Q. Fulvius Flaccus. And other new created, that is to say, T. Ottacilius Crassus the second time, Q. Fabius the Conful his son, who at that time was Ædile of the chair and P. Cornelius Lentulus, After the Election of the Prætors was ended and finished, there passed an Act and decree of the Senate that Q. Fulvius should extraordinarily have the charge of the City, and be Pretor there: and that he above all other, when the Confuls were gone forth to the wars should be President and Governour of the City of Rome. There fell great rain and much inow that year, whereby the Tiber Goverflowed the fields overthrew many houles, and overwhelmed much cattel and people, to as they utterly perished Thus in the fifth year of the second Punick war, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time, when they entred their Confulfhip, fet the City on thinking and muling of them more than usually had been known. For in many years there had not been the like couple of Conjuls. And old men would talk and fay, that even fo were Max. Rullus and P. Decius declared Confuls against the Gauls war: and after them likewise, Papyrius and Carvi-

cells was created Conful in his absence, whiles he was with the Army abroad, and Fabou beingth himself pretent and president of the Election, was ordained to continue till in his Contultain. The occasion of the time, the necessity and occurrence of the wars and the perill and hazard of the whole state were such as no man looked nearly into the exemple and precedent to find fault withall, nor had the Conful in any jealouse of ambition and delire of rule : but rather every man commended his noble and hauty mind, who feeing that the Common-wealth flood in need of an excellent Captain, and knowing himself without all question to be the man, made less reckoning and account of the envy and ill will of men, that thereby haply might accrue, than of the good and profit of the Common-wealth. The same day that the Consuls began their office, they astembled the Senators in the Capitoll: and the first thing they did, was a decree that the Con-1 fuls flould either cast lots, or agree together between themselves, whether of them two should affemble the people for the election of Cenfors before he fet forward to the army. After this all they had their authority prolonged and continued fill, who were employed abroad with the forces; and their commissions were renewed and sealed again, for to abide in the government of their Provinces: to wit, T. Gracehus at Luceria, where he abode with the army of the Voluntaries: C. Terentins Varroin the Picene country: M. Pomponius in the Province of Gaul (on this fide the Alpr.) It was enacted also, that of the Prators of the former year, Q. Muting as Vice-Prator should govern Sardinia: that M. Valerius at Brundusiam should course the river, look to the lea-coalts, and have an eye to all the attempts and enterprises of Philip King of the Ma edonians. P. Corn lius Lentulus, the new Prator, was appointed to rule the Provin eof Sicily and T. K Offacilius to be admiral of the same Navy, which the year before he had the charge of against the

Many prodigious and firange figns were reported that year and fo much the more as they were believed to be true of the simple and superstitious fort of people. Namely that within the happel of Softer Juno in Languam, the Ravens builded their nelts. In Apria agreen palm tree was on a light fire. At Mantun a pool maintained by the overflowing of the river Mineius, appeared red with bloud. At Caler it rained chalk, and at Rome in the beafts market it rained bloud. In2 village, called Istricus a spring under the ground, brake out and yielded such abundan e of water. that it overturned, tumbled up and down and carried away (as it had been the ftream of a river) divers vessels, as pipes tuns barrels and terces that were in the place. The open and publike half L within the Capitol, the Temple of Valcan in Mars field, a nut-tree in the Sabins country: the high street, the wall, and a gate at G. bii, were all blasted with lightning and fire from heaven. And by this time other mir tenious and monitrous figns were commonly blown abroad to with that the spear of Marsin Prenefts of its own accord stirred and moved forward: that an oxe was heard peak in Sicilin : that the Infant within the mothers womb, in the Marrucans country was heard to,cry lo Triun-ple, at Spole um, a woman turned to be a man. At Hadria there appeared an Altar in the skie, and pparitions or shews of men dill overed about the same, arraied in white. At Rome also within the City was feen, now the fecond time, a fwarm of Bees in the very marketplace : a thing wondred at because it was rare and seldem known. Some there were also, that avouched how they descried armed Legions on the his Jimiculums Whereupon the City rose up M in arms and when they were come into the Janiele, they faid plainly, that there were none there appeared but the ordinary inhabitants of the hill. These prodigious fights by direction from the Arufoi es, i.e. the Sooth Lyers] were expire, and the gods pacified with greater facrifices : and a folemn procession and supplication was proclaimed unto all the gods that were shrined at Rome, and had their chappels there.

After all complements performed, that belonged to the pacification of the gods, the Confuls proposed unto the Senat concerning State-matters, and especially about the managing of the wars Namely what for es should be prepared, what numbers of souldiers levied, and where they should be bestowed severally And agreed it was That there should be eighteen Legions emploied in the wars. Whereof the Confuls were to take unto them two apiece: the Provinces likewife of N Gaul; Sicily and Sardinia should be guarded each of them with other twein. Q. Fabius the Lord Deputy of Apulia, was to have two Legions under his hand to command the Province: and T. Gracehus other two of vo untaries to keep the country about Luceria: and C. Terentius the Pro-Consult to have the charge of one in the Picene country and M. Valer us another, for the Navy about Brundussum: and last of all, twain were left behind for the guard and defence of the City of Rome. For to make our this tull number of Legions fix of necessary were to be levied new And the Confuls were appointed with all convenient speed to carroll them: and likewise to provide an Armada that year of 150 Gallies, together with those thips which ride in the river along the coalts of Calabria for the defence of that Country. When the muster was done and the new ships haled and thot into sea, Q Fabius attembled the Centuries for the election of Centors: wherein were O created, M. Attilius Regulas, and P. Furius Philus.

The rumour fill encreased, that Sicily was out, and up in arms, Whereupon T. Ottacilius was commanded to go thither with his fleet. And because there wanted failers and mariners the Confuls, by vertue of a decree of the Senat published an Edit, That as many as in the time of L. Amylius, and C. Flaminius Centors, either themselves or their fathers were affested in the Subsidy book, from 5000 a Aff. unto 100000 ingoods, or who afterwards grew to that worth should find one mariner, and fix months pay. Item. That who locver were rated above 100000 unto 300000

A should be charged with three marriners, and one years pay, Item, That who loever were valued in the Cenfors book between 300000 and 1000000 should allow five marriners. Item, That those above that proportion should set out seven, And every Senat should provide eight mariners, and furnish them with a whole years pay. According to this Edict, themariners were let out well armed and appointed by their Matters, and having with them aforehand meat drefled and fodden to serve them thirty daies, they were embarked. This is the first time that ever the Roman Navy was furnished with sailers and mariners, at the proper charges of private Citizens.

The four and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

This extraordinary preparation more than usuall, terrified the Campans most of all other, for R fear left the Romans would begin war that year with laying fiege to Capas. Therefore they difpatched Embassadors unto Annibal, requesting him to come nearer unto (pua with his forces. For why? at Rome there were new armies levied, for to affair that City: and the Romans were not discontented more with the revolt of any than of them. And for simula as this message was delivered in such haste and fear, Anniba' thinking it good to make speed, lest the Romans prevented him, dislodged and removed from Aspi, and encamped upon Tifala over Capua; in the fort, where he kept of old. Then, leaving the Numidians and Spaniards behind him both to guard the Camp, and allo to defend Capua, he went down with the relt of his army to the Lake Avernus, pretending in shew there to facrifice, but in very deed to jound and solli, it Puresti and the garrison there for to rebell. Maximus was no sooner advertized that Annib I was departed from Arpi, and in his Creturn to Campania; but he journied night and day, and never staid, until he was come again, and repaired to his army. And withall, he gave order and direction unto T.Gracchus, to remove with his power from Laceria, and to draw near to Reservation: likewise unto Q Fabrus the Prator, (who was the Conful his fon) to supply the room of Gracehus at Luceria. At the fame time the two Prators took their journey and went into Sicily, P. Cornelius to the army there on land and Of acilius to keep the sea-coast, and to be admiral of the Navy: and the rest spred them every one into their several Provinces. They also who had their authority and government continued ruled the same countries that they did before.

Whiles Annibal abode at the Lake Avernus, there came unto him from Taren'um, five noble young Gentlemen (Roman affociats) which had been taken pritoners, some at the pool Thresimen mis, others at Canne, whom he had fent home in the same manner of currefie, as he had shewed ever to all the Allies of the Romans. These Gentlemen, in remembran e of his favours and benefits, made report vnto him, "That they had perswaded and induced a great part of the youth of "Tarentum, to entertain rather the amity and alliance of Annibal, than of the people of Rome: "and for this intent they were sent Embassadors from them, to request in their name, that it "might please him to come nearer with his forces to Tarentum. For fay they, if they might but "once see from out of Taren um his standard and ensigns, and himself near encamped, the City "would without delay be furrendred up into his hands. For the younger people had the com-"mons at their beck and commandment, and the commons ruled the whole state of Tarentum "at their pleasure, Annibal after he had commended and thanked them, and withall loaden them with many fair and great promites, willed them to return home, to halten and fet forward, and effect these intended designments, saying, that he would be there in good and convenient time. With these hopes the Tarentins took their leave, and departed. Annie al himself was wonderfully defirous to be Master of Tarentum, He saw it was a noble City and a wealthy leated also by the sea-fide, and a very commodious Port, looking and lying toward Macedonia: and well he wift that King Phil p (if he should pais over into Italy, leeing the Romans were possessed of Brundustum) would arrive at this haven. When he had performed the Sacrifice for which he thither came, and (whiles he made his abode there) forraged all the Territory of Cumes, even as far as the Cape of the Promontory Misenum: suddenly he turned his army and marched to Puteolis for to surprise and give a camifodo to the fort and garrifonthere. There were fix thoufand of them within the town: and the place not only by naturall fituation flrong, but also furely fortified by industry of man. Annibal having staied there three daies, and assaid the fort and the garrison on every side, feeing he could not prevail not effect any thing, went forward from thence, and proceeded to the walting of the Territory of Naples, upon anger, rather than any hope of gaining the City. The Commons of Nola, who long time were discontented with the Romans, and at deadly fewd with their own Senators, upon his coming into the territory and confines io near unto them. began to rife in a commotion. Whereupon there came Embassadors unto Anaibal, requiring him to advance to Nola, upon affured promife, that the town should be delivered into his hands. But Marcellus, who was fent unto by the Nobles prevented this their plot and defignment: and in one day he reached to Sueffula from Cales, notwithstanding he made tome stay to ferry over the river Vulturnus. And to the next night he fent into Nola 6000 footmen, and 300 horse, for to aid and G defend the Senat. And like as the Conful bettiered himself with all speed and diligence, to make Nota fure to him aforehand, to Anaibal contrariwite temporized, being not fo ready now to credit the Nolans; as having twice before given the like attempt, and to no purpose in the end, and therefore he trifled out the time and made small hafte,

At the same time also, Q. Fabius the Consul came against Casilinum, which was kept by the garrison of the Carthaginians to see if he could surprise it, And to Beneventum at one time (as if they had been so agreed) came on the one fide, Hanno from the Brutii, with a great power of soot and horse; and on another fide, Gracehus from Luceria: who entred the town first. From whence so foon as he heard that Hanno lay encamped within three miles of the City, by the river Calores, H and there watted the Country, he himself issued, and pirched his tents within a mile of the ene. my: where he affembled all his fouldiers together, purposing to make a speech unto them. He had with him the Legions that confided most of voluntaries, who already two years before, had been more willing to deferve their freedom in filent manner, than to challenge and demand it with open mouth. Howbeit, he perceived when he departed out of the winter harbors, that they began to murmur and grumble in thearmy when they marched and to complain in this wife. What? shall we never serve in the quality and condition of freemen? Whereupon he had written unto the Senat and shewed unto them not so much what they defired as what they deserved to have certifying them, that unto that day they had done him good and valiant fervice : and wanted nothing t fave only their freedom, but they might go for true and lawful fouldiers. Whereupon the Lords of the Senat had put it unto his diferetion for to do by them what he thought was expedient for the Common-weal. Thereupon, before that he should join battell with the enemy, he pronounced these words before them all, and said: "That now the time was come, of obtaining and acqui-"ring that liberty, which follong they hoped after. For the next morrow they were to affront "their enemies with banner displaied, and to fight in a plain and open ground, where without " fear of any ambush the triall might be made with meer force and true valour: Whosever there-"fore can bring me the head of an enemy him my pleasure & will is, to make free immediatly and "who to lofeth ground and retreateth, him will I chaffile as a bondflave ought to be punished. "Now every man hath his state and condition lying in his own hands: and of your freedom, K "not only mytelf will affore you, but for further warrant ve have the allowance of M. Marcellini "the Col and generally of all the LL of the Council, whole advice I fought, and who committed "unto my hands the ordering of your liberty, And withall he read the Confuls letters, and the decree of the Senat in that behalf. Whereat they fet up a mighty cry, in token of their affect and anprobation, and called for battel, and carnefly urged to give the figure out of hand. Then Gra of me having pronounced the next day for battel, dismiffed the affembly. The fouldiers were posous especially such as were to have their freedom in reward of one daies service; and best owed the rest of that day in making their armor and weapons ready. The morrow after to foon as the trumpets began to found: they were the first of all other that presented themselves before the General his pavilion, well appointed and ready to fight; and by the fun thing Gracely hed forth his men into L the field in order of battel. The enemies for their parts were nothing behind, but forward to encounter them. They were in number feventeen thousand of footmen most of them Brutii and Lucans: of horiemen, twelve hundred: among whom there were very few Italians, the reft were in manner all Numidians and Moors. The fight was there and continued long and for four hours it was not feen which fide had the better. No one thing elfe troubled the Romans more; than their enemies heads, which were the prizes to redeem the fouldiers liberty. For as any had killed their enemies luftily, they were fain fift, with much ado, to cut off their heads, within the troublefome preis and tumult, and so to lose time and after that by reason that their right hands were emploied and occupied with holding the same heads, it fell out that the best souldiers gave over fighting, and the feeble dastards and fearfull cowards only were to maintain the conflict. Which when the M Marshals of the field and Colonels reported unto Gracehus, and namely, that there was not a fouldier of the enemies standing that was wounded and burt any more: but they that lay along were hacked and hewed as it were by butchers: and that his own fouldiers inflead of fwords, held their enemies heads in their hands: he commanded in all halle, that upon a fignal given, they should fling away their heads from them, and charge afresh upon the enemies. For their valour and prowefs (faith he) was well enough feen already, and evidently teffified, and follong as they were so hardy men and bare themselves so manfully they should not need to doubt of their liberty. Then the conflict began to be renewed and withall the horsemen charged the enemies whom the Numidians received with equall valour: infomuch as the fight of the Cavalry was, as bravely performed, as the other of the Infantry: wherenpon once again the victory feemed doubthil, to N which part it would encline: whiles in both hofts the Generals reproached and debated the adverse part. Gracehus said that the Brutii and Lucans were so often vanquished and subdued by the Roman ancestors: and Hanno again girded at the Romans, calling them bondslaves, and fouldiers let looie out of prison and houses of correction. At the last, Grucchus declared a loud, and said, They were not to hope at all for their liberty, unless that day their enemies were discomfited and put to flight. This one word of his at length fet their bloud in such an heat, that they raised a fresh shout, & asifthey had been cast again in a new mould they charged upon the enemies, so violently that they could no longer be relifted and withflood. First, they that fought in the vangard of the Carchaginians were put out of order; then they about their standards and ensigns; and last of all, the whole battel was driven back and gave ground. Wherupon they fairly turned their backs, and O fled to fast one upon another into their Camp, in such fear and fright, that not so much as at the very gates, nor upon the rampier, they flaid once, and turned again to make head : so as the Romans following them hard at the heels into their camp as it were in one train pel-mel made a new skirmish even within the rampier of their enemies. Where the fight was not so cumbersome, by reason of the streightness of the room wherein they were pent, but the massacre and execution was as crueil and bloudy. The prisoners also that were among the enemies, in this confuled conflict and tumult joyned themselves and fluck close together; and having caught up some weapons

The four and twentieth Book of T.Livius. A helped forward the victory: and either charging upon the backs of the Carthaginians flew them or elfe hindred them in their flight and running away. So of that great army, there were not all out two thouland (and the most part of them horsemen) that escaped with the Generall himself. allthe reft were either flain or taken prisoners: and of military entigns were carried away forty fave twain. Of the Victors, there died fast upon two thousand. All the spoil, but only the prisoners, was granted to the fouldiers. The cattell alto was referved, as many as within thirty daies the right owners could juftly make claim unto for their own. When they were returned laden with booties and pillage into the Camp there were almost 4000 of the voluntary souldiers, who had fought but faintly, and brake not into the Camp with the rest: who for fear of punishment seized Ba little hill not farfrom the Camp, and kept it for their hold. But the morrow after, being fet from thence by the Colonels, they repaired again to the camp, at was time as Gracehus had summoned his fouldiers to an affembly. Where, ther that the Pro-Conful first had rewarded his old fouldiers with military gifts, according to each one hisprowels and good ervice in that battell: then as concerning the voluntaries, he faid thus much, That he had rather they were all commended by him good and bad, one with another, than that one of them that day should talke of any punishment : and therefore he pronounced them all free in the name of God, to the benefit, happinels, and felicity, both of Common-weal, and also of themselves. At which word, they listed up their voices aloud with exceeding cheerfulness and alacrity: and one while they clipped and embraced one another in their arms, with gratulation and great joy: another while again, they held their C. hands toward heaven, wishing and praying at the gods hands, all good bleffing for the people of Rome, and for Gracehus especially, "Then (quoth Gracehus) Before that I had made you all alike, "and to have equall part in the right and priviledge of freedom, I would not let upon any of you, Geither the mark of a flout and hardy fouldier, or the note of a faint-hearted and heaftly co-" ward. But now that I have discharged my self of the trust committed unto me by the Common-"weal to the end, that all difference between prowels & cowardile, should not be forgotten al-"together and perish; I will take express order that the names of them, whose conicience accused them of faint fighting, and avoiding the hazard of battell, and therefore crewhile withdrew "themselves apart, be brought unto me. And when they are cited and called forth every one by his "name, I will compell them to take a corporall oath (quoth he Jthat unless it be upon tickness, so D "long as they shall continue in souldiery they neither eat nor drink but standing upon their teer, "And this punishment (I am fure) you will willingly take in good part: when ye shall one on bet-"ter of it, and fee that you could not have had an eather note of dilgrace and thame, for your false "hearts and slender service. Then he gave the signall to truss up bag and baggage, and sounded the remove, and so dislodged: and thus the souldiers carrying and driving before them their booties, all the way disporting themselves so merily and jocund, returned to Beneventum as if they had come from some great dinner, upon a solemn and sestival day, and not from sighting a blondy battell. All the people of Beneventum came forth ingreat numbers to meet them at the gates, welcomed the fouldiers, bad them joy, embraced them and invited them to their houses, to give them entertainment and lodging. The boords were spread in every mans court-yard, and furnished E with store of viands: they willed them to come and make merry with them, and requested Gracchus to give his fouldiers leave to feast and make good chear. And Gracehus was content, but uponthis condition, that they should all eat their meals abroad in the open street. Then all things were brought forth, and fet upon the tables at every mans door. The voluntaries took their repast and resection either with their caps on their heads, or eise covered their crown with white wooll, some sitting, some standing : waiting and serving one another at the table, and eat their meat, and fed with them together. This was such a worthy light and folemnity that Gracehus after he was returned to Rome, caused the representation and resemblance of the celebration of this day, to be drawn and portraied in colours and the picture to remain in the Temple of the goddels Liberty, which his father caused to built in the mount Aventine, of certain fines and forfeits, and F afterwards there dedicated it. Whiles these matters thus passed at Beneventum, Annibal having spoiled and harried the territory about Naples, removed toward Nola, and there encamped before the town. Whom when the Conful understood to be coming, he sent for Pomponius the Pro-Prætor, together with that army which lay encamped above above Sueffula, and provided to meet with the enemy, minding presently to bid him battell. He sent out Claudius Nero with the strength of his horsemen in the dead time of the night at a back gate, that was farthelf from the enemy, giving him in charge to cast about closely, and setch a compass, and sair and softly to follow the enemy, as hemarched: and when he perceived the battell was begun, then to come forward, and fer upon him behind on his back, But whether it were that Nero missed of the way, or having not time enough, could G not put this policy in execution, I know nor, in his ablence the armies joyned battel, wherein no doubt) the Romans had the better hand. Howbeir, for default that the horiemen were not there in due time, the order of the direction failed, and took not effect. And not with standing that the enemies gave ground and retreated, yet Marcellus durit not follow hot upon them, but founded the retreat to his own men, being in a good way of victory. Yet were there by report above 2000 of the enemies slain that day, but of Romans under 400. And about the sun set, Nero who all the day and night past, had tired horie and man, and done no good, and now returned, without check to choak him, That it was long of him and none elle, that they had not cried quittance u with the enemy for the overthrow & lois received at Canna, The day following Marcellus came down again into the field, ready to give battel. But Anni al, as one that fecretly confessed himself to be overcome held himself close within the strength of his Camp. And on the third day giving over all hope to get Nola, (an enterprise that never sped well) he departed in the still time of the night toward Tarentum, upon a better and more affured hope to gain it by treason.

The civill affairs at Rome were managed with no less courage at home, than the wars in the field abroad. For the Ceniors, who by reason that the City treasure waxed low, were eased of their care offerting out the publike works of the City by the great: and having nothing elfe to do.emploied themselves in reformation of mensmanners and chaftifung of vices and enormities, which for upon war: like as mens bodies, which by long and lingring fickness grown weak, ever and anon breed new diseases. And first they convented before them those Citizens, who after the bartel at Canna, were (by report) minded and disposed to leave the Common-weal, and to depart our of Italy. The ring-leader of them all was L. Cecilius Metellus, who happed then to be Treasurer of the City, He, with the rest of that crue, who were culpable in the same crime, were commanded to make their answer, and plead their causes: but when they were not able to clear and quit themfelves, the Centors charged them openly, that they had given out certain words, and made speeches against the State, tending to a sedition and conspiracy, for to abandon Italy. Next after them were cited to appear those curning and crafty companions abovelaid, who with their over-subtill inwho being on their way to Rome, came back tecretly into the Camp of Annibal, and took themfelves freed and dif harged, because they had sworn to return again. But these and the others afore rehearied, as many as ferved upon the City horles, had their horles taken from them, were displaced out of their Tribe, and condemned all to lose their voices, and to serve without City pay, Neither were the Ceniors carefull to correct the Senat, and reform the degree of the Knights only, but all o they proceeded to rafe out of the publike checkroil of the younger Citizens, the names of all those, who for four years space had not served in wars, as many, I say of them, as could not infely plead and alledge, either ordinary immunity by law or fickness for their excuse. And of these were found guilty above 2000; who were awarded to be Erarii, and all of them to be rethe Ceniors, there passed a heavy decree of the Senat against them, to wit, That all they whom the Cenfors had thus foored and noted, should be bound to serve on foot in the wars, and be confined and sent over into Sicily, to the residue there of the army that remained at Canna. And no other time of service and warfare was limited unto this fort of the fouldiers, but untill theene-

Then repaired unto the Cenfors the Masters of those bondmen, whom T. Sempronius had manumited and extree at Beneventum, laying, that they were fent by the Triumvirs, out of the office of the Bankers, called Menfaris, for to receive again their monies, according as they prized and valued their flaves : howbeit, they would not, before the war was finished. And as the hearts of the Commons were thus favourably affected, to instain and support the poverty of the treasurehouse; so the flocks of money also that belonged first to Orphans, and afterwards to widows began now to be bestowed in the Chamber of the City: and they that presented and brought in those moneys, believed atturedly, that they could not lay them up more fure and safe, than in the publike credit and security of the City. And whatsoever out of these stocks was disbursed and defraied for to buy and provide any thing for the Orphans or widows aforefaid, the treasurers kept a book thereof, and noted it down in a register. This kindnels and benevolence of private persons unto their country, extended it fell from the City, even as far as to the Camp: infomuch, that neither horieman nor Centurion would take their wages, but rebuke and rate them that could find in their hearts to receive their pay terming them no better than mercenaries and hirelings.

Now Q. Fabius the Conful lay in Camp before Cafilinam, which City was kept with a garrison of two thousand Campans, and seven hundred of Annibal his souldiers. They had for their Captain and Commander one Statius Metius, fent thither by Cn. Magins Attellanus; who for that year was * Mediafinitions of Capua. He put the bondflaves and Commons in arms, interming led one with another, for to enter upon the Camp of the Romans, whiles the Conful was buffein affaulting Casilinum. Fabius was nothing ignorant of all these things, and therefore helent unto Note to his Collegue there, fignifying unto him, that there was need of a fecond army to make head against the Campans, whiles the other was employed about the affault of Castlinum: and telling him befides, that either he must himself come in person, leaving a mean gamfon behind him at Nola: or else if he might not be spared from thence, for fear of danger from repretation and confirming of words, would feem to avoid their oath: those captives, I mean K moved out of their tripe. And besides this shamefull disgrace and note of ignominy awarded by my were driven clean out of Italy. Whiles the Cenfors, as is afortaid, upon occasion that the Cities stock was so decayed, gave over and forbare to bargain for the repairing and maintenance of the Churches and holy Temples, and for the finding and provision of chariot horses for the State and such like; there resorted unto them a great number of those that were wont at the spear to take these bargains at their hands by the great, and for a gross sum of money: who exhorted the Censors to deal in those matters fill and to let, let, and enter into bargain with them, as if the City Chamber wanted no money: making this offer that none of them all would demand paiment out of the common Cheft, before the wars were fully ended.

A Annibal, he would fend for T. Gracchus the Pro-Conful from Beneventum. Upon this meffage, Marcellus having left in Nola a guard of two thousand souldiers, with the rest of his forces, prefented himself before Casilinum: upon whole coming, the Campans who were ready to set forward, staid themselves and were quiet. So both Consuls together jointly began to assault Cassin num: where the Roman fouldiers that rashly came under the walls received much hurt: and Fabias feeing little good done, judged it best to surcease and give over the enterprise, being a service of small consequence, and nevertheless very dangerous : and to depart from thence, seeing there was bufiness toward of greater importance. But Marcellus contrariwite was of opinion and faid. that as there were many things which great warriors were not to attempt: to if they were once B taken in hand, and the adventure given, they were not lightly to be given over and laid, afide; forasmuch as in it lay matter of great consequence, for same and reputation, both waies: and so he prevailed, that the enterprise was not neglected and abandoned. Whereupon, there were mantilets, and all other kinds offabricks and engines of bettery and affault, bent against the City: 10 as the Campans belought Fabius, that they might depart to Capua in lafety. And when some few were gone forth, Marcellus possessed himself of that gate whereout they went: & then they sell to kill and flay one with another first about the gate: and after they had rushed once in they put to like execution those also within the City. Fifty there were or the eabout of the Campans that first got out of the town, and fled for mercy to Fabius: and they by his guard and fale conduct arrived at Capua, But fee Cafilinum, through the lingring flackness of the Inhabitants that craved C protection, was (by advantage taken of their long parley, and temporizing) won by the enemies. The captives, to many as were either Campans or Annibal his fouldiers, were fent to Rome, and there clapt up fult in prisons. But the multitude of the townsmen were distributed into fundry Citiesadjoyning, and there kept in ward. At the very same time that the Consuls after their conquest, retired from Casilinum, Gracehus being in the country of the Lucans, and having gathered and enrolled certain cohorts and companies of fouldiers out of those parts, sent them out a forraging, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies, into the territories of the enemies. Hanno encountred them as they stragled infeattering wife out of order, and fet upon them, and paid his enemies again with the like deteat and lofs, or not much less than that which he had received at Besevenum: and in great hait withdrew him-D felf into the country of the Brutis, for fear left Gracebus should overtake him.

The Conful Marcellus returned back to Nolas from whence became and Fabius went forward into Sammium, to spoil and waste the country, and to recover by force of arms the Cities which had revolted. The Samnits about Caudium were pitiously and grievously damnified: their villages in alliplaces let on fire, their fields laid waste and destroyed, and great booties both of cattel and people driven away, Six towns forced by affault, namely, Competitivis, "Telefia, Coffs, Mela, "Thelefi Fuifale, and Orbitanium. In the Lucans country, the town of "Blendae" and in Apalia, the City "Beleader." Anca was assaulted. In these towns and Cities, there were taken priloners and slain 25000 * Callipelio of the enemies: of fugitives and runnagate traitors there were recovered 370, whom the Conful fent home again to Rome, and being thither come, they were all beaten and scourged with E rods in the Comitium, and then pitched down headlong to the earth, from the rock Tarpeia, Thele exploits were atchieved by Q. Fabius, within the compals of a few daies. But Marcellus by occasion that he lay fick at Nola, was hindred from performing any feats of arms. The Prætor likewife Q. Fabius, who had the charge and jurildiction of the province about Luceria, wor byforce about the same timethe town Accus, and sortified a standing camp planted before Ar-

Whiles the Romans were thus employed about these affairs in divers other places, Annibal was come unto Tarentum, to the exceeding great damage and detriment of all places where he journeyed: but being once arrived in the territory of Tarentum, he began to march and lead his army most peaceably. There he did no harm at all, made no havock nor once went out of the F high way. And it was evidently seen, that all this was done not upon any modelly that appeared either in souldier or Captain, but only to win unto him the hearts of the Tarentins. But when heapproached the walls of the City, and law no commotion, nor infurrection from thence upon the discovery of his Vanguard, as he thought he should, he pitched his Camp almost a mile from the town. Now had M. Valerius the Vice-Prator, who was Admirall of the Fleet at Brundufium, fent T. Valerius his Lieutenant unto Tarenum, three daies before that Annibal shewed himself before the wals. He had mustred and enrolled the slower of the Nobility, and so beflowed at every gate, and about the walls where need required, good guards for defence; with such vigilant diligence both day and night, that he gave no opportunity and advantage either to the enemies to adventure any affault, or to the doubtfull and untrufty friends to practice any trea-Gion, So Annibal, having spent there certain daies in vain, and seeing none of them who repaired unto him at the Lake * Avernus either to come themselves, or to fend messenger or letters: and * Lago di Triperceiving now that he had rashly and soolishly followed vain promises, and so was deluded; dislodged and removed from thence. And even then also he spired the territory of Tarentum, and did no hurr at all: and albeit his fained and counterfeit lenity and mildness hitherto took no effect: yethe hoped fill thereby to corrupt their faithfull alleageance to the Romans: and so he went to Salapia. And (by reason that midiummer was past, and he liked well of that place for a winter harbour) he conveyed thither all the corn from out of the Territory of Metapontum and Heraclea. Then he fent out the Numidians and Moors, to fetch booties and prizes from out H of the Salentine country, and all the woods and chases next unto Apulia, from whence they drave of other cattell small store: but of horses e pecially they brought away great numbers, of which there were four thousand divided amongst the horsemen to be handled, broken, and made

The Romans seeing there was like to be war in Sicily, & the same not lightly to beregarded :& that the death of the Tyrant there, rather gave the Syracusans good Captains, than wrought any change in their minds, or a teration in the cause: affigned unto M. Marcellus, one of the Consuls, that Province to govern. Prefently upon the murder of Hieronymus, first the souldiers in the Leontin country, began to mutine and make an uprore, and boldly spake and faid, That the Kings, death should be expiate, and his obsequies solemnized with sacrificing the bloud of conspirators. But afterwards, when they heard often iterated the sweet name of liberty and freedom restored unto them; and that there was good hope that the fouldiers should have a largels dealt amonest them out of the Kings Treasure, and be under the command of Captains of better quality, and has ving befides all this, a bedroil rehearled unto them of the Tyrant his cruelty and foul facts, and of more filthy and loathfome lufts: their affections were lo altered that they fuffered the body of their King to lie above ground unburied, whom a little before, they so greatly defired and wished for Now as concerning the conspirators, whiles the rest of them remained behind to assure and posfeffe themselves of the army, Theoderus and Sofis took the Kings horses and rode post, as hard as ever they could to Syracufa, for to surprize upon a sudden all his followers and favourites (who k knew nothing of that which was done) and fall upon them at unawares: but they were prevented not only by the fame (which above all other things in such cases is most swift) but also by a courrier one of the Kings fervants, Whercupon Andronodorus had feized beforehand of that part of the City which is called the Island, together with the Castle, and all other places that he could come at which were thought of any good importance; and them he fortified with good guards. * The City of Theodorus and Solis being entred within the City at * Hexapylos after fun-fetting in the twy-light and flutting in of the evening; and shewing the Kings royall robes allembrued with bloud, and the ornament and attire likewife of his head, he paffed through * Thica, and called alond unto the people to fight all at once for their liberty, and to arm themselves, and willed them to repair into * Acradina. The people some of them ran out into the streets, others stood in their entries and porches divers looked out at the windows from within their houses, and asked what the matter * In other aumight be? Every place shone with torch and cresset-light, and was filled with sundry garboils and thors called. burlyburlies. As many as were in arms gathered together in the open places of the City thole that Tyche or Take were unarmed, took down off the Temple of Jup. Olympius the spoils of the Gauls & the Illyrians, Fortuna,wh...lc Temple there which the people of Rome had given as a present to K. Hiero, and which he set aloft for a memoriall: praying unto Topier that he would vouchiafe them this gracious favour, as to bestow those facred weapons & harnels upon them that meant to arm themselves therewith, for the desence of their country for the maintenance of the Churches and shrines of the gods, & for the recovery of their liberty. This multitude alto joyned with the corps de guards, that in the principal quarters of the City, were bestowed in places convenient. But Andronodorus amongst other places that he for-tified, made sure also with strong guards of armed men the publike garners of the City within the M Island. There was a piace enclosed round about with four-square stone, and built strongly like a fortress; this was possessed by the youth that had been appointed for to guard and defend that quarter : and they fent messengers into Acradina, to signific that thegarners and the corn were kept by them to the behoof of the Senat, And on the morrow at the break of day, the whole people as well armed as unarmed, affembled together in Acradina, within the Palace. And there before the alter of Concordia, which in that place food erected, one of the principal and chief Citizens, named Polyneus, made an Oration unto them all, with frankness of speech enough, tending unto liberty and yet featoned with modelty & moderation, in this wife: " Men(quoth he) that have exe perience of servitude and other indignities, fall to abhor the same, and their stomacks risea-, "gainst them as known evils. But as for civill discord, what calamities & miseries it bringeth with N "its the Citizens of Spracufe have heard their fathers tell, and not feen and tafted themselves. That " ye have been to ready to take up arms and weapons in hand I commend you for it: but I would con you more thank, if ye used them not, unless ye be driven thereto by extream necessity. "For the present, I hold it good, and my counsel is, that Embassadors be sent unto Andronodors, " to intimate unto him, yea, and to require and charge him, to submit himself unto the Senat and espeople, and by them to be ordered : to set open the gates of the Island, to put away from about "him his guard, and deliver up the castle and garrison. But in case he intend under the pretence " of being guardian or protector to the kingdom of another, thereby to usurp it to his own use; "hemust be given to understand by mine advice that we wil seek to recover our liberty out of the "hands of Andronodorus more fiercely and forcibly than from Hieronymus, And fo prefently apon this affembly embaffadors were fent. Then the Senat went together and fat in Council: for as during the raign of Hiero, there was fet an ordinary publike Councill of State: fo after his death unto that day, the Senators were neither called together, nor their advice taken or fought in any matter. When the Embassidors were come unto Andronodorns, and had delivered their mes-fage, he was himself (verily) for his own part moved with the generall consent of the Citizens;

but especially when he considered, that among other quarters of the City possessed by the ad-

A verse side that one part also of the Island, which was the strongest, was betraied (as it were) and held out against him. But when the Embassadors called still upon him to come forth, his wife Demarata, daughter of King Hiero, puffed up ftill with the proud mind and haughty ftomack of a Prince and full of the vain humour and spirit of a woman, put him oftentimes in mind of a saying, that Denis the Tyrant had evermore in his mouth, namely, "That a man should not ride on horse-"back to be deposed from his royall dignity and estate of tyranny, but be led fair and softly a footat pace, and go to that as a bear to the stake. An easie matter (quoth she)it is for one to yield and "forgo the possession of high place and honour, and a thing that may be done in the turning of an hand, when soever one will: but to compass and attain thereto is a right hard matter, and of all B" other most disticult. You were best therfore to borrow some reipit of time of the Embassadors. " for to take farther deliberation of this main point, and in the mean while, to use the advantage

"thereof, to fend for the Souldiers out of the Leontin country : unto whom, no doubt if you "would promife a reward out of the Princes treasure, you shall be Lord of all. This perillous unhappy counsel of a woman Andronodorus neither despised and rejected - ltogether nor yet presently accepted and embraced: supposing it a better and safer course, if he meant to appire unto high dienity and great puissance, for the present to temporize and give place unto the necessity of the time. And therefore he willed them to carry back unto the Senat this answer from him, That he submitted himself, and would be ordered & set down by the Senat and the people. The morrow after, lo loon as it was day-light, he caused the gates of the Island to be set open, & shewed himself

C in the market-place of Acradina: where he affended up unto the altar of Concord from which the day before, Polyneus had made a speech unto the people. He began his Oration with an excuse of his late coming and long flay behind, and craved pardon therefore: alledging, "That he had kept The Oration "thegates shur, not because he meant to separate his own affairs from the State, and not to take of Andronodo " fuch part as the City took but when Iwords were once drawn he feared what would be the end rus. After this speech ended, he laid down the keys of the gates, and of the Kings treasure, at their feet. And so for that day, when the people were dismissed from the assembly, with joy and mirch they went in procession and supplication with their wives and children, round about all the Churches & Chappels of their gods. The day following, the folemn election was held for the creation of Prators. And first, before all others, Andronodorus was chosen, and the rest for the most part, the very murderers of the Tyrant, They elected also two that were absent, to wit, Sopater and Deomenes. Who being advertized of all matters that pailed at Syracule, delivered up the Kings treasure which lay in the Leontins country, and was now brought unto Syracuse, into the hands of the Treasurers; who for the same purpose were created Likewise that which was in the Island, and in Acradina, was committed over unto their custody. That part also of the wall, which divi-F ded the Island from the rest of the City, and was supposed too strong a bar between was by common confent cast down and rased. And as their minds were thus affected and enclined to procure and maintain liberty, so all other matters forted surable and followed after accordingly. Hippocrates and Epicides, when fidings came of the Tyrants death (which Hippocrates would fain have had concealed, and therefore flew themessenger that brought news thereof) being forfaken of the fouldiers, returned to Syracufa; supposing for the present, that to be the safest course they could take. Where, because they would grow into no suspicion, nor to be noted to seek for some opportunity and occasion of change and alteration in the State, first they presented themselves before the Prottors and Governors of the City, and so by their mediation, they had access to the Senat. They gave out, "That they had been sent from Annibal unto Hieronymus G" as unto a friend and confederate, and had yielded obedience unto him, as they were willed by "their own Generall and Commander, Now their defire was, to return again unto Annibal, But "forasmuch as they might not travell in safety, for the Roman forces, that ranged all over " Sicily, they craved a convoy and sufficient guard to conduct them, as far as to Locre in Sicily: ". Aluring them, that by this small curtesie and defert of theirs, they should reap great thanks of " A. mibal, and come into high favour with him. The fuit was foon obtained. For defirous they "were that those Cavalies that used to lead the King, and were expert and skilfull besides in war, "and the rewith needy and audacious should be sent away : but they made not so good speed to put this their delire in execution as they should have done. For in the mean feason, these young to and lufty matiall men, and such as ever had converted with the fouldiers, went up and down one while to them, another whiles to the fugitive frangers that were revolted, (who for the most part were failers and fea men that came from the Romans) yea, and forted themselves with the bafell and most abject persons of the Commoners, spreading tales, and whispering into their ears fundry suspicious matters of crime against the Senators and great men of the Nobility, laying, that they plotted and practifed clotely under hand nothing elfe, but that Syracufa, under a colour of reconciliation and accord should be reduced to the obedience of the Romans: and then, the file and faction and some few with them that are of councell to renew the association, might be Lords, and tyrannize over the reft. By this means there flocked multitudes, every day more than other to Syracula: whole ears were tickled, and itched fill to hear fuch furmiles, and were and enough to give credit thereto. And they gave not only Hippocrates and Epicides, but Andronodorus also good hope of an alteration, and a new world. For he (being at length overcome with the importunate juggestions of his wife, who ever put into his head, That now was the only time to nturp and take upon him the rule of the State, whiles all things were troubled, and in a confusion, upon their new and unknown liberty; whiles the fouldiers were presented in their way, to be dealt withall, and daily maintained and fed out of the Kings Exchequer, and whiles those captains fent from Annibal, by reason of their acquaintance with the souldiers, were present to set forword and further his defignments) first therefore acquainted Themistius, who had married Gelo his daughter, with his complot: and after a few daies (full unadvifedly) imparted his mind alfo, it unto one Arifto, an Actor of Tragedies, whom he used aforetime to make privy unto his other secrets. This Arifto was well born, and descended of a worshipful house, a man in good place and of honest reputation: and his profession (for among the Greeks it is reputed no matter of shame to play either in Tragedies or Comedies) was no blot either to his birth, or disgrace to his calling: and therefore as one who made more reckoning of his duty to his country than of private friendthip, bewrayed & disclosed all the treason unto the Prætors. Who finding by good proofs and certain evidences that this was no forged and counterfeit information, after confulration had with the Ancients of the Council, by their warrant and direction, fet a guard of armed men about the door of the Senat House, and so soon as Themsstius and Andronodorus were entred in place, slew them outright. And when there began some uprote upon this fact, which in shew seemed very horrible and hainous (especially to all the rest that knew not the cause:) at length they appealed the tumnit and caused silence, and brought the informer into the Council House, that had detected the intended treaton: who declared all things orderly in particular: namely, that this conspiracy was deviled and iprung first from the marriage of Harmonia the daughter of Gelo, who was wedded unto Themilius: that divers auxiliary fouldiers of Affricans and Spaniards were appointed and provided to maffacre the Prætors, and other principal Citizens: that their goods were promiled unto the murderers to be ransacked and rifled: that besides, there was a band of mercenary fouldiers (fuch as were wont to be at a beck, and ready to execute the commandment of Andronodorus) fet in a readine's to seize the Island again, and keep it to his use. And when he had laid every thing abroad in order, with all circumstances, what the practises were and by whom they were to be performed and executed, and shewed before their eyes most plainly the whole conspi racy: & namely, what persons and what forces should have been employed. Then the whole body of the Senat were likewite verily perswaded that they had deserved such an end and were as justly murdered as Hieronymus. But without the Councel-House door the consisted multitude, compofed of all forts of people, who were doubtfull of the matter, and knew not what to make thereof, cried out. And albeit they menaced and threatned before the entry and porch of the Senat. yet at the fight of the dead bodies of the Conspirators, lying before their face, they were affrighted and foon huffit to as with great filence they followed the whole body of the Commons to the publike place of affembly Unto whom, Sopater, by order from the Senat, and his fellow Prators, was commanded to make an Oration. Who if they had perished either before Hieronymus, or at least wife together with him, they had been but well enough ferved. But they, who long ago had deferved to die and for whom the "gallows had already groned, cealed not flill, after the death of the tyrant, to devile and plot new "mitchiefs, one in the neck of another. At the first, openly in the fight of the world, Andronado "rus by flutting the gates of the Island, entred by way of inheritance upon the kingdom, and "fought to feize in his own right, and immediat heir apparant, upon those things that he held " under the Prince, only during his nonage. At these words, the people from all parts of the affembly began to cry out with one voice; that neither of them both were worthy to live, nor any one besides of the Kings stock and linage ought to remain upon the face of the earth, See the nature and disposition of the multitudes Either they ferve basely, or rule proudly. Liberty that is the mean between, they have neither the B skill to despife with reason, or the grace to entertain in measure. Now, there wanted not (vernav besure as at all times else) ready instruments and firebrands, to help forward, and kindle more anger, firch, as feeing the Gommoners diffempered already, and bloudily minded of themselves, put them forward to murder; and maffacre. As it appeared then; For immediatly, as the Prators put up a billsthar all the Kings flock should be rooted out, and the whole live utterly extinguished: before in manner that it was all read out and published, it passed clear, and was granted. And prefently there were fent our certain perions from the Prators, that murdered Demarat a and Harmonia the daughters of King Hiero and Gelo, the two wives of Andronodorus and Themiltius. Now there was another daughter of Hiero, named Heracles, wife to Sofippus, who having been fent as Embaliador from Hieronymes, to King Ptolomeus, choice a life in voluntary exile, and lived not with Chis wife. She having an inkling given her aforehand, and knowing that the murderers were coming also toward her, took her two daughters, virgins: and together, with their hair loofe hanging down their shoulders, and in other most poor array and rufull habit, able to have moved pity and compassion, they were sled into a privat Oratory or Chappell unto their house-gods, to save themselves. The mother seeing the murtherers sell to entreating them most pitiously, and recom- The pitifull mended unto them the late remembrance of her father Hiero, and her brother Gelo: " Beseech- words of dame " ing them not to suffer her (an innocent and guiltless person) to fare the worle, and be punished. And to shifted for themselves, poor wenches, by running to and fro within the house, (which was not large and spacious) that for a good while they escaped amongst the thickest of so many armed men, and oftentimes avoided their reaches, and caught no harr : yea, and when they had caught hold of them, not with franding they were to struggle with so many hands, and those so strong, yet they wound away from them all: untill at lengthafter they had received many a wound, and filled every place with bloud, they fainted and Giunk down, and vielded up their innocent spirits. This murder, no dout, was of it telf pitious; but much more lamentable, by occasion of a present accident. For straight after came a messenger with express commandment, to spare the women, and not to kill them: for that upon a sudden the hearts of the people relented, and enclined so mercy. But when they heard there was so quick dispatch made of execution, that neither they had time to bethink themselves and repent, nor space to cool upon their hear, they fell pity and compassion into an extream fit of anger and choler. The multitude the reupon began to mutter and murmur, and called to have an election of Prætors in the room of Andronadorus and Them: Rius (for they were both of them Prators:) which new election was not like to fall out in the end to the good liking and contentment of the other H Practors in place. So a day was fet down, and proclaimed for this election. At which time, it hapned that beyond all mens expectation, one from the farthest part of the affembly nominated Epicides: and then another from thence named Hippocrates. After which the same voices camethick and threefold fill fo as it feemed the multitude would wholly go that way. The people there affembled were a confused fort intermingled, as well with a number of fouldiers, as of a company of Citizens and Commoners; yea, and many of them were strangers fugitive, shuffled among, fuch as rather than their life defired a generall change and alteration. The Prætors at first diffembled all, and would feem to take no knowledge thereof : but thought it best to put off the marrer to a farther day : yet overcome at last with the common accord and consent of the people : and I fearing withall a mutiny and fedition pronounced and declared the men aforenamed for Prators. Neither would they at first hand so soon as they were created set that abroach which was in their mind and defire to effect: notwithstanding they were displeased and discontented much both for that there had been Embassadors dispatched unto Appins Claudius, about a truce for ten daies : and also when it was obtained, that there were others addressed to treat for the renewing of the ancient league with the Romans, At the same time (Ap, Claudius) the Roman General lay at Murgantia with an Armada of 100. gallies, waiting there to hear what was the event of the troubles which arose upon the murder of the tyrants: and how far forth men would proceed upon this their new and unwonted libertv. And much about those daies, when as the Syracusian Embassadors were sent from Appius unto K Marcellus now coming into Sicilia, Marcellus himself after he heard the conditions of peace, thought they would grow to some good agreement and conclusion in the end : and therefore sent other Embassadors to Syracuse, personally to debate and confer in the presence of the Prators, concerning the renewing of the League aforesaid. But by that time, they found not the City in the same quiet tune and peaceable state. For Hippocrates and Epicides, after news came that the

to effect that which they intended Much credit was given (as it should seem) unto those slanders and lewel luggestions: infomuch as at the first, the multitude ran to the waters side in a great hurry and tumu tuous manner to hinder their landing, it haply they attempted it. In this troublesome confusion of all things, it was thought good, that the people should meet together to deliberate what was but to be done. In which affembly, whiles fome drew one way, others haled and pulled another way, and were at the point to mutine and grow to a fedition, Apollondes, one of the principall and thief Citizens, made a speech to very good purpose for preservation of the publike peace, and thus he faid: "Never was there any City nearer, either to hope of affured fafety; orto The Oration "fear of utter destruction, than this of ours at this present. For if all would go one way together, "and with one accord either encline to the Romans, or bend to the Carthaginians, there were M "not a City under the cope of heaven, whole state were more happy and fortunate than ours.

of Apollonides, to the people of Syracufe.

"But in case we de distracted, and the Common-weal go divers waies, there would not be more "bitter and crueil war between the Syracufians and the Romans, than among the Syracufians "themselves: when within one and the same walls, there should be banding one against another, "and each fide have their forces, their armor, and their Cr Captains of their own, And therefore "we ought of all hands to endeavour what we can, that all may be of one mind and draw in the "fame line. As for the main point now in question, Whether society and alliance be the better es and more commodious, the Romans or the Carthaginians, is a matter of ar less moment and " importance than to be consulted and fludied long upon. How beit, in choosing our friends and " allies, we are to be directed by the authority and act of Hiero, rather than of Hieronymus: and N " to prefer that amity which we have tried for fifty years in much felicity, above a friendship for "the prefent unknown, and sometime heretofore found unfaithfull. It maketh somewhat also, to " resolve upon this course, that in case we should deny peace and alliance to the Carthaginians, "we need not prefently go to war with them : but with the Romans we must out of hand make "account either of peace, or elle of hot wars. This speech of his the less that it savoured of lactious partiality and affection, the more authority and Iway it carried with it. And befides the deliberation of the Prators and choice Senators, the advice also of the martiall men were taken And therefore the Captains of all their own enfigns and companies, yea, and the great Commanders of the auxiliary forces of their allies were willing to fit in Council together with them, Whenthe matter had been often debated, and much contention and hot words passed between, at the last, O because there appeared no colourable reason or canseto make war with the Romans, they agreed that a peace should be concluded, and that together with their Embassadors, there should be others also from them to ratifie and confirm the thing.

There passed not many daies between, when out of the Leontins country there arrived certain Orators, to crave help and succour for the guard and desence of their marches. This Embassinge seemed to come very fitly and in good time, for to exonerate and rid the City of theurruly and disordered multitude, & likewise to send out of the way their Captains and ringleaders.

A So Hippocrates the Prator was commanded to lead thither the fugitive strangers. Many also of the mercenary fouldiers, that were waged to help them in their wars, accompanied them : fo as in all, the number amounted to four thousand. This expedition and journey contented greatly as well the fenders and fetters of it out, as also the parties themselves that were sent forth. For these of the one fidehad a good occasion and opportunity now offered them, to contrive a change in State(the only thing that folong they had defired) and those of the other, were right glad, that the fink (as it were) of the City was now well foured and voided away. But this was like the palliarive cure of a fore, and a lightning for the present of a fick body: whereby it might soon after by R relapse fall back, as it were, into a recidive, and a worse dilease and more dangerous than the other. For Hippocrates began at first to make rodes by stealth into the confines bordering upon the Roman Province, and there to waste & spoil: afterwards when Appius had sent a power of men to defend the frontiers of his confederats, he charged with his whole power upon that guard that was opposed against him, and slew many of them. Whereof, when Marcellus was advertized he dispatched Embassadors incontinently to Syracuse to charge them with the breach of peace; and to give them to understand, that there would never be wanting some occasion or other of marrell and war, unless Happocrates and Epicides were removed, and sent far enough out of the way, not only from Syracufe, but also quite out of Sicily. Epicides for tear left if he remained prefent in the City he might be charged and brought in queltion, for the fault and trespats of his brother abc fent, or be wanting for his part, in the raising of new war; went himself also in person into the Leontins country; and feeing them there forward enough of themselves, and provoked already against the Romans, began also to alienate and turn their hearts from Spracule. For in these terms he fuggefted and informed against the Syracusians: namely, "how they had capitulated with the "Romans, that all the Cities and Nations which were under the Kings, should be subject unto "them and within their jurisdiction: so as now they cannot be content (quoth he lwith their li-"berry, unless they rule also like Lords and Kings. I would avite and counsell you therefore, to "fend word unto them and give them to understand, that the Leonins likewise deem it good " reason, that they should themselves be free: in regard either that the tyrant was killed within the ground of their City, or because the first alarm for liberty began there. For they leaving and a-" bandoning the Captains there that followed the King ran at once from thence to Syracufe. And

D bandoning the Captains their characteristics and article out of the influment of the covenants, therefore they are (faith he) to rafe that aforeful article out of the influment of the covenants, " or not to accept at all of peace with that condition. Soon were the multitude perswaded hereunto. And therefore when the Embaffadors of the Syracufians came to the Leontins, both to make complaint for killing of the Roman Corps de guard, and also to command peremptorily that Hippacrates and Epicides should depart either to Locri, or to what other place they would rather chuse. fo they went their waies and voided clean out of Sicily: they returned unto them this flour anfwer again: that neither the Syracufians had any commission and warrant from them, to make peace with the Romans in their name, neither would they be tied and obliged to any confederacy made by others than their own felves. This answer the Syracusians made report of to the Ro-Emans, and faid plainly, "That the Leontins were not under their jurisdiction, to be ordered and " censured by them : and therefore, any thing comprised in the league with them notwithstand-"ing the Romans might war against them without breach of any covenant : and in that war they "would not for their parts fail them, but do their best:upon condition, that when they were once "fubdued, they might be reduced again under their obedience, according to the covenant comprehended in the League. Whereupon Marcellas with his whole power went forth against the Leontins, and fent for Appins also, to affail them on the other side: and so hot were his souldiers in this service, and bare themselves so resolute, for anger that the guard was slain, during the time that there was treaty of peace between that at the very first assault they won the City. Hippocrates and Epicides, after they faw the wals scaled, and the gates of the City broken open, betook chemselves for their safety, with some few into the Castle, from whence by night they made a secret escape, and fled to Herbefus.

As the Syracusians marched from home with a power of eight thousand armed men, and were come forward, as far as to the river Myla, they met with a meffenger, who told them that the City Leontium was forced. They reported other news belides, as well lies as truths, one with another, namely, that townsmen and souldiers indifferently without respect were put to the sword; that he thought verily there was not left one alive of fourteen years of age and noward; that the City was put to the fack, and all the rich mens goods-were given away. At this fo fearful and horrible news, the army staid and went not forward. And when they all were greatly troubled, their Leaders Sofis and Diomenes, consulted what to do. This loud lie arose not upon nothing, but was occasioned by mistaking of a matter. For there were scourged and beheaded of sugitive traitors, to

G the number of two thousand. But of Leontins and other souldiers, there was not one hurt after the City was loft. And every man had all his own goods restored unto him again: saving that only which in the first hurlyburly of a City newly won hapned to miscarry and perish. Howbeit upon this bare report, they neither could be induced to go forward to the Leontins, complaining and grieving that their fellow fouldiers were so betrayed and murdered, nor yet to abide therestill for to expect and hearmore certain tidings. The Prætors perceiving their minds disposed to revolt, and yet hoping that this mutinous fit of theirs would not continue long, in case the Captains and heads of their fury and folly were once rid out of the way led the army to Megara: and went themselves in person with a few horiemen toward Herbesus, hoping to gain the City by treason H whiles they all there were affrighted. But feeing that enterprise would not prevail they minded to use forcible means. The morrow after they dislodged and raised their Camp from Megara, purpofing with all their forces to affail Herbefus. Hippocrates and Epicides supposing this to be the only way for them, although at the first light not the fafelt, (considering all hopes besides were cut off namely, to put themselves into the hands of the souldiers, who were for the most parracquainted with them, and belides, upon the bruit of the execution and maffacre of their tellow fouldiers. throughly chafed, went out to meet the army. The formost ensigns in the forefront, hapned to consist of those fix hundred Cretensians, who in the wars of Hieronymus had served under them. and received a favour and benefit at Annibal his hands. For being taken priloners at Thrasymens, I among other auxiliaries that came to aid the Romans, they were fet at large and fent away withour ransom. Whom when Hippocrates and Epicides knew by their colours, habit, and fashion of their armour they held out branches of olives and other vails and tokens of suppliants, befeeching them humbly to receive them, and being once received, to vouchfafe to protect them, and not to deliver them into the hands of the Syracufians: by whom they should soon be yielded unto the people of Rome, for to be murdred and cut in peeces. At this they all cryed aloud with one voice. and willed them to be of good chear, for they should fare no worse than their own selves. Upon this communication the enfigns flaid, and the army flood fill and marched not forward: but the generall Captains wift not as yet what the cause might be of this stay. After the rumour was spread that Hippocrates and Epicides were come, and that all the hoft throughout by a generall applause K feemed to like well of their coming: the Prators incontinently fet fours to horie, and rode forward apace to the foreiront of the vanguard demanding of the Cretenfians, what manner and fathion this was of theirs? and how they durft be fo boid, as to parl and talk with enemies? and without license of their Prætors to entertain them within their companies? And herewith they gave commandment, that Hippocrates should be apprehended and bound sure with chains. At which word the Cretenfians fet up such a cry, and the rest to answered it again with the like, that it was well feen, in case they had proceeded forward as they began, they should have incurred themselves no small danger. And thus in great perplexity, and lear of their own lives, they commanded to turn entigns, and retire unto Megara, from whence they came; and dispatched messengers preiently to Syrucufe, to fignifie in what terms they flood. Hippocrates feeing the fouldiers gi- L ven to be suspicious and ready to beleeve every thing, devised a cunning shift bendes, in this manner. After he had fent out certain of the Cretentians to belet the waies between them and Syracuse, he pretended that they had intercepted someletters from thence, which he read unto the fouldiers and were indeed framed and indired by himfelf. The tenor of the letters ran in this form: "The Prators of Syracufe to M. Marcellus their friend greeting. After their falutations and com-"mendations premifed, as the manner is it followed written thus: you have done well and or-"derly in sparing none at all of the Leontins But all other mercenary touldiers besides are in the "fame Predicament : neither will Syracufo be ever in quiet, so long as any forrain aid be either in " the City, or in your army. And therefore our advice and counfell is, that you would endeavour "to get them into your hands, who with our Prætors are encamped before Megara; and by exe- M " cution of them to deliver and let Syracule free in the end.

The contents of their letters were not to foon read, but with such an outery and alarm they ran to their weapons on all hands, that the Protors amidft this garboil were fain to ride away as fast as they could gallop toward Stracuse. But although they were fled, the mutiny nevertheless continued and was not appealed: for the fouldiers fell upon the Syracusans that were in the camp amongst them and they had all drank of the same cup, and not one escaped; but that Epicides and Hippogrates came between, and opposed themselves against the multitude in this their surious rage not upon any pitifull compassion that was in them, or regard of common humanity, but because they would not cut themselves from all hope of return; and besides, they were not only defirous to have the fouldiers themselves affectionate upto them and faithfull, and withall instead N of hostages: but also purposed, by this so great delert, first to gain and win unto them the kinsfolk and friends of thole fouldiers, and afterwards to oblige and bind them fast, by so good a pawn and gage-remaining still among them. And having good experience, with how small a pust and gale of wind the common people turneth every way, they suborned a fouldier, one of them who was befieged within the City of Leontium; to carry news to Spracufe, futing with those falle tidings that were reported at the river Myla: yea, and to aver the same confidently upon his own knowledge, and tell things that were doubtfull, as if they were most certain, and by himfelf seen and known: thereby to ftir up men to anger and indignation. This fellow was not only credited of the common multitude, but also being brought into the Council-House, he greatly moved the Senat: infomuch as fome of them, more light of beliefe than others, gave it out openly and faid, O "That it was happy, that the avarice and cruelty of the Romans was thus discovered among the Leonans. And god blefs us from them here. For if they fet foot once within Syracufe, they "would commit the like ourrages, yea, and worfe too a great deal, and more horrible; as they " should find there greater matter to work upon, and to satisfie their coverous and greedy appe-"tite to the full. Whereupon they agreed in generall, to shut the gates, and to stand upon their guard, and defend the City. But they all feared not alike, nor hated the same persons. For the martiail men, in a manner every one, and a great part of the common people abhorred the name of the

A Romans : the Prætors, and some few of the principal Citizens, albeit they were in the huff, and possessed with the falle report aforesaid, yet they had more regard to provide for a mischief that was more imminent and near, and ready prefently to fall upon their heads. And now by this time Hippocrates and Epicides were come before Hexapylos. Within the City, the kinsfolk and friends of those Citizens which were in the army, drew together in conventicles, conferred among themselves to set the gates open, and agreed to have the common country of them all to be defended against the violence of the Romans. Now, when one only wicket of Hex. 1912 was opened and they ready to enter in thereat, the Prators came upon them in the manner. And first they com-B manded by word of mouth, and threatned them; after that, by vertue of their place and authority they feemed to fright and terrifie them : and last of all feeing nothing could prevail, forgetting their own dignity and majesty of their calling, they fell to pray and entreat them not to betray their country to those, who aforetime were the infiruments and supposts of the Tyrant. and now the orrupters of the army. But so deaf ear gave all the multitude in this their rage and furious fit unto the Prators, that they within, as well as without, fet their hands to, by all forcible means, to burst down the gates, and so when they were all broken open, the army was let in fafe and received within the Hexapylos. The Prators fled for refuge with the youth and firength of the Citizens into Acradina. The mercenaries, the fugitives, and all the fouldiers that were left in Syracufa (of them who ferved the King) joyned to the army, and augmented their forces. And C to Acradmu alfo, was upon the first assault won. All the Pretors, but those that escaped by slight, and faved themselves in the midst of this hurry, were stain : and the night coming upon them, staid the maffacre. The day following, all bondflaves were called to receive the cap, and made free: the prilons were let open, and the priloners let go at large. And this confused rabble and multitude of all forts created Hippocrates and Epicides Prators. And thus Syracufe, having for a short time liberty shining favourably upon it fell again into her old fervitude. When news hereof came to the Romans, incontinently they dislodged and removed the camp

When news hereof came to the Romans, incontinently they diflodged and removed the camp from Lowitims, and marched directly towards Syraesif. It happed the fame time that the Embaifadors fent from Appine by the way of the haven, were embarked in a galleace of ive banks of oars: but another galley of four banks which was fent before, was not foloon en red into the mouth of the harbour, but it was taken: and the Embafladors hardly, and with much ado efcaped in the other, And now, the world there was grown to this pafs, that no laws of peace, no, nor io much as the very laws of arms were observed, but broken clean: at what time as the Roman army lay in camp a mile and an half from the City, and Olympium, the Temple of Japiter, For when it was thought meet to fend Embafladors from thence, Hippocrates and Epicides with their followers encountred them without the gate, and charged them upon their perili not to enter the City. The Roman Orator alledged, and hid, "That he came not to proclaim was againft the Syracuficians, but to bring aid and help, as well unto those, who having escaped out of the midtle of the "flaughter fled unto the Roman Camp, as also unto them, who being kept under with fear, endure bondage and thraldom more milerable than banishment, yea, and death it self. Neither will Etcher will the the Romans (faith he) put up that shamefull and cruell murder of their Allies without due reversely of the first perions who were fled for successions the more members.

E" the Romans (faith he) put up that shamefull and cruell murder of their Allies without due re"venge. And therefore, if those persons who were fled for succour unto them, may return home
"safely into their country: if the authors of that massace abovedial, be delivered into their hands:
"and if the Syracusians may enjoy again their liberty, together with their laws, there shall not "need any hostility or war. But in case these conditions be not performed, they would persecute
"with fire and sword, all such as shall hinder and thand against the same, who loever.

To this Epicide: framed his words in this wise: "If (faith he) ye had any message and commissions."

"front o any with my brother and me, we would return on a nafwer accordingly. In the mean "while ye were best be gone for this time, and return again when the City and state of Sprace of shall be under their governance, unto whom ye were lent. As for war, if the Romans think it good to deal that way, they shall find and know by experience, try when they would, that it is cone thing to assail spraces of an another to set upon Leontium. And so leaving the Embassadors, "he made the gates sait against them."

From this time forward, the Romans laid fiege unto Syracufe, and began to beleaguer it both by sea and land at once. On the land side at Hexapples, by water at Acradina, upon the walls whereof the sea beateth. And like as they won the City of the Leontins, by terrifying them at the first assault, and therefore distrusted not, but that they should force and enter this also, one side or other, being to large and vast as it was, not compact, but built so scattering, one part far asunder from another, they approached with all their fabricks, engins, and ordnance of battery against the walls. Which enterprise of theirs, so resolutely begun, and so hotly and forcibly sollowed, had sped well and taken effect, if one man at that time had not been in Syracuse, Archimedes was he,a fingu-Glar Astronomer, A rare man for contemplation and behold g the sky with the Planets, and other flasstherein fixed: but a more wonderfull engineir for devising and framing of artillery, ordnance, fabricks, and inftruments of war, whereby he would with very little ado, and at eafe, check and frustrate all the inventions which the enemies with so great difficulty had prepared for to give the affault. This conning artificer and admirable workman had planted engins of all forts upon the curtain of the wall, which stood on certain hills, and those not of even height: and having for the most part high places that yielded hard accesse, and some other low again, whereunto men might come on even & plain ground, he fitted and furnished every place accordingly. Now Marcelles from out his gallies of five ranks of oars; affaulted the wall of Acradina, which (as is above-H faid) is washed and dashed upon, with the sea. And from the other gallies, the archers, slingers. yea, and the light armed darrers (called Velites) whole javelins are of that fashion, that they be unhandsome to be lanced back again (by those that have not the cast and skill of it) so assailed the defendants, that they hardly suffered any one to stand upon the walls without hurt and danger; Thefe, I say kept their gallies far distant from the wall, because archers and darters had need of some space and compais to lance and let drive their shot. But unto the gallies of five course of oars. there were adjoyned other two of either fide: for which purpote the oars within were taken away, that they might close larboord to starboord; and so be coupled one unto the other. And thus being rowed as one entire gally, by the help of theutmost oars without, they carried upon I themplatforms of timber, framed with floores and lofts of planks, and other engins and infirmments within them to batter and shake the walls. Against this artillery from the gallies, Archimedes bestowed and disposed upon the walls counter-engins of fundry fixes, some greater, some smaller. Against those gallies that were furthest off he weighed and discharged stones of exceeding main weight, and those that were nearer, he annoyed with lighter bullets, but those he shot farthicker upon them. And latt of all, to the end that his own Citizens might, without taking harm, make a counter-battery against the enemies, and so annoy them, he caused certain barbacans or loop-holes, almost a cubit deep to be pierced through the walls, and to stand thick from the foot thereof, to the parapet; and all to flank the enemy, through which overtures, they within that closely against the enemies, some arrows out of bows, some quarrels out of scorpions and K brakes of mean and indifferent bignels. And against those gallies, which approached more close and near under the wals because they would be within the shot, and that they within might carry and levell over them) hedevised a crane or swipe to be planted alost upon the walls, having at the one end, which hung over the sea, a drag or grapling hook of iron like an hand, fastned thereto with a throng chain: which took hold upon the prow of a galley, and when the heavy counterpoile of lead at the other end weighed it down to the ground, and therewith drew with it the prow up on high, whiles it hung thus aloft in the air, the galley flood in a manner endlong upon the poop, And then the swipe being let go again all at once suddenly with a sway, dashed the gallev tumbling (as it were) down from the top of the wall, with fuch a fwinge and violence against the water (to the exceeding fear of the mariners) that if it had faln directly downright upon the L keel, yet needs it must have received good store of water into it. Thus all their provision for affault by the sea-side, was deluded and made void: and then they turned their whole forces from thence, to give affault by land. But even that part of the wall likewife, was as well turnished with all manner of engins and ordnance, provided at the great charge of Hiero, and by his carefull forecast for many years together: but devised and framed by the artificial cunning and skill only of Archimedes. Befides, the naturall scituation of the ground was a great help: for that the rock, upon which the foundations of the wall stand, is for the most part so steep and bending forward, that not only the shot levelled out of an engine, but also what soever was but rolled & tumbled down, with the very own weight and poile came with a great force & violence upon the enemy. Which forefaid cause made the affailants to have disficult climing up, and as unstedfast sooting and kee-M ping of their hold. Whereupon they went to counsel, And considering well, that all their attempts and enterprizes were thus deluded and mocked by the enemy: it was thought good to give over affault, and only by long and continuall fiege, to cut them off from all victuals both by land and fea. In the mean while Marcellus with one third part (well near) of the army, went forth in expedition, to recover again those Cities, which taking occasion upon these troubles, were revolted to the Carthaginians. And he gained Pelorus and Herbesus, which yielded on their own accord. As for Megara, which he won by affault, he rased it down to the ground, and sacked it to the searful example of the rest and especially of the Syracusians.

And much about that time, Himilco also, who had a long time rid in the Bay of the Cape Pachynus with his Armado.disbarked and fet aland at Heraclea (which they call Minoa) 25000 foot-N men 2000 horsemen, and twelve Elephants. He had not all this power of men when he lay with his fleet under Pachinus, For after that Hippocrates had taken and held the possession of Stracula, he went to Carthage, where, being fent unto both by Embassadors frgm Hippocrates, and also by letters from Annibal (who moved him and remonstrances, That now the time was come to recover Sicily again with much honour and glory: and being himself there present in person nobad follicitor by word of mouth to further and follow the cause) he easily perswaded the Carthagimans and prevailed that as great a power both of horse and soot as might possibly be raised, should pass over into Sicily. Being arrived at Heraclea, within few daies after Agrigemum was delivered up into his hands, And all other Cities, which had banded and taken part with the Carthaginians, were put in to good hope to drive the Romans ont of Sicily: that even they who were belieged O within Syracule, to take heartunto them; and were foin their ruff, that supposing part of their forces sufficient enough to defend their City, they parted between them the charge and managing of the whole war in this manner: That Epicides should remain behind for the guard and defence of the City, and Hippocrates joyn with Himilco, and war joyntly against the Romans. He with 10000 foot, and 500 horse, set out by night: and passed between the Corps deguard, where none at all warded, and encamped about the Acerra. As they were fortifying their Camp, Marcellus came upon them as he retired back from Agrigentum, possessed now by the adverse part: whither

A he had made great haste, but in vain, in hope to prevent his enemies, and get thither afore: bur little thought he (and nothing less) than in his return from thence, at that time and in that place, to meet with an army of Syracusians that thould make head against him. Howbeits for fear of Himileo and the Carthaginians, whom he knew to be abroad, and with whom he was not able to make his part good with that power which he had about him, he marched as circumpeckly as he could, having his eye on every side, and led his army in good order of battell against all occurrences whateover might happen by the way. And so as good hap was, that carefull forecast and diligence, which he was provided with against the Carthaginians, served him in very good stead against the Sicilians, Finding them therefore busic in pitching their tents, without order, and say there to the sword, Bur the Cavalry after a slight skirmish begun, sed with their leader Hippermes to Acre. Marcellas after he had by his slight repressed and kept in the Sicilians, who were at hand to fall away and revolution to the Grans, returned to Syn & ys: and after some few daies, Himileo joyned with Hippermes, and en amped about eight miles from thence upon the ri-

Likewise about the same time, or very near, it happed that 55 war-ships of the Carthaginians, under the conduct of Bomilear. Admirall of the Armado, put into the great haven of Syrange out of the deep and main sea: and also the Roman sleet of thirty Gallies, with five ranks of oars, arrived at Panormus, and landed the first Legion there: and thus the war was turned add diverted C from Italy. So wholly seemed both nations, as well Romans as Carthaginians, amused upon nothing now but Siely. Himileo making full account to prey upon the Roman Legion which was set al and at Panormus, as they should come to Syrangs in missed of the right way to meet with them: for he marched and led his power far within land higher in the country, but the Legion coasted along by the sea side, accompanied as it were with the fleet which slanked them: and came to Pachinus unto Appines Claudius, who with part of his forces went out to meet them on the way. But the Carthaginians made no long stay about Syrangs, For Bomilear having small trust and confidence in his ships considering that the Romans were coming toward him with a steet, and were twice as many in number: and withall seeing, that by so journing there, he did no other good but with his company impoverish and eat out his friends, speed and hoised up tai', and with a merry

D wind passed over into Assirick. Himitoo also, who had dogged and followed after Marcellus in vainas far as Spreass, to espy some good opportunity and vantage to bid him battell, before he joyned with a greater power: seeing that he was hereof dislappointed, and the enemy lying about Syracuse safe and secure, as well in regard of their fortifications, as their forces: because he would not spend any longer time to no purpose in setting there still, to look upon their Allies how they were besieged, he dislodged and removed from thence: attending, wheresoever there were any hope and likelihood of revolt from the Romans, shither to come with his army, and shew himself inperson, to encourage and annimate by his presence those that savoned his part. And first he recovered Margania, where the Roman gartison was betrayed by the inhabitants, and delivered unto his hands, Into which City the Romans had conveyed greatstore of cost, victuall, and profess all forts. Upon this revole, other Cities all to took heart unto them, and the Roman gartisons were either thrust and driven out of the Castles and Fortresses, or else were reacherously betrayed, surprised, and destroyed.

The City \(\mathcal{E}\) may feated upon an high hill, and on every side inaccessible as it was by naturall fituation of the ground impregnable, so it had a strong garrison within the Castle, and a Captain of that garrison, one, that was not so easie to be compassed and over-raught by deciricult rains. His name was Pinarius, a witry man, and bardy withall. who reposed more trust in his own diligence to prevent, that he might not possibly be decived; than in the truth and faith of the Sicilians. And at this time more than ever-before, he strong upon his guard, and took heedfull care of himfelf and his charge, by occasion that he heard of somany treacher, ies and treasons, so many revolts for Cities, and massacres of gartisons: and therefore as well by day as night, he looked that the Castle was well provided and furnished of good watch and ward continually. It he soldiers never departed from their armour nor their appointed place. Which when the chief Citizens of Emms perceived, who already had covernanted with Himileo, and promised to berray the fort and the gartison: and saw that the Roman Captain was so wary, that he lay not open unto the opportunity of any fraudulent and guilefull course, they resolved by apert and open means to effect this their designed enterprise. They alledged therefore unto Pinarius, "That the City and Castle "both onght to be in their power-since that they entred into league and amity with the Romans "as freemen, and were not yielded as flaves to be kept in durets and prison. Reason would there "fore, and meet it was (as they thought that all the keys of the gares were delivered unto them,

Then quoth Pinarius to them, If ye think much to address your messener gers to the Contul, yet do me this favour, as to call a Common Councill of the people for my "fake, that I may know whether these demands proceed from some few, or from the whole "body of the City. So it was accorded and agreed, that a generall affembly should be proclaimed against the morrow. Then Pinarius after that he was departed from this parly returned into the re fortress, and calling his souldiers together, spake unto them in this wife: "I suppose ye have heard "already (my fouldiers) in what fort the Roman garrifons have, these daies past, been betraved and murdred by the Sicilians, That treachery hitherto ye have avoided and escaped; first & prin-"cipally through the goodness of the gods: next and immediatly by your own valour and pro-"weis, by continual watch & ward, standing in your armor both day & night, And I would to "God ye might pais as well the time to come, without falling into this hard choice either to endure and fuffer such horrible mischief; or to execute and commit a fearfull example of cruelty. See many case there be not one of them ce escape your hands and remain alive, from whom ye may sear any harm, either by fraud or "force, And now I befeech thee O Dame Ceres, and thy daughter Proferpina, and all other gods " in heaven above, or inhell beneath, who inhabit this City, these holy lakes and sacred groves, "wherein ye are honoured and worshipped, to vouchfase to be propice and favourable unto us; "in case we enter into this action and enterprise, for the avoiding of treachery intended against sus, and not to offer mischief unto other; and not otherwise. I would use more words unto you "my friends and fouldiers, for to animate and encourage you, if it were that you had to deal " with meninarms : but fince they are naked unarmed, & unwarned, you shall kill and slay them "at your pleasure, and satisfie your selves with their bloud, And to the end that you need not sear "any harm from Himilco and the Carthaginians, loe the Conful himself lieth encamped near " at hand. After this exhortation they were dilimified, to take their refection and reft. The next day, they were bestowed in fundry parts of the City, some to beset all the streets, others to stop the passages and the waies against the townsmen, that they might not escape. But the most of them flood upon and about the Theatre, and were nothing suspected as being used heretosore to behold and fee the affemblies of the people. The Roman Captain Pinarius was by the Magillrates N brought forth and presented before the people: where he pleaded, That it lay not in his hands but in the power and authority of the Conful, to dispose of that which they demanded : and he iterated for the most part the same allegations that he shewed the day before. At first they began gently, some few by little and little; afterwards more and more of them, required him to deliver vp the keys; and so consequently all with one voice, charged and commanded him so to do: and when he feemed to make some stay and defer the matter, they menaced and threatned fiercely, yea, and seemed as if they would no longer forbear but proceed to extream violence. Then the Captain made a fign with his robe, according to the former agreement: and with that the fouldiers who had their eyes upon him waiting wiltly for the fignall and were ready for execution, let up a loud cry and ran some from a lost upon the multitude assembled over against them; others stood thick o at every corner of the Theatre, where the people should go forth, and opposed themselves against them. Thus the men of Enna, thut up and penned within the Theatre were maffacred and lay tumbled one upon other; not they only that were killed, but such also as fled one over anothers head : the found fell upon the wounded, the quick upon the dead, one with another, by heaps. Then there was tunning from thence fundry waies, and as if the, City had been taken upon affault by the enemy, there was nothing but murdering and flying away in every place, And as hot and furious were the fouldiers in the execution of this unarmed multitude (whom they judged wor-

A thily and juftly to be killed) as if like danger prefented unto them, or choler raised in set battel, had provoked them thereto. Thus £nna was held still for the Romans by this means: were the deed imply ill, or by circumstance needfall and necessary; Marcelum milliked not of the tack, & granted the pillage of the Citizens of £nna to the fouldiers: (upposing that the Sicilians throughly frighted by this searfull example would betray no more garritons, The calamity and hard fortune of this City, (standing, as is tidd, in the very hear of Sieuly) was in one day divulged and noticed thoughout the Island, from one end to the other, And otherwise, a samo and remowed town it was, either for the natural situation so exceeding strong: or because all places in it were accounted sacred and holy, in remembrance of Prospensivho in times pathleft her footing & tracesthere, at gwhat time as she was stool naway & ravished by Pinno. [Now it was generally thought by the Sicilians, that this curied and derestable mastare had desiled and polluted not only the habitations of men, but also the temples of the gods: whereuponeven they like wise, who shood but doubtful and indifferent befores fell now away from the Romans, and turned to the Cartheginians.

Then Hippperates retired to Murgantia and Himileo to Agrigentum: who were tent for by the configirators and traitors within Limband approached with their forces, but to no purpose. Marchair returned to the Leontins country: and after he had brought into the Camp corn and other victuals, and left there a mean guard, he prefented himself to the feege that lay before Syracufe. And when he had fent Appius Cludius to Rome to live for the Confulthip, he committed the charge in his room of the Armado there, and the old leaguer that T. Quintus Criftinus, Himself C erected and fortified his winting harbours five miles from Exapplos, as a place which men call Leontin, And these were the affairs of Sicily unto the beginning of winter.

In the same summer the war began likewise with King Philip which long before had been suf-

pected. For there came Embassadors from Oricum to M. Viderius the Prator Admiral of the fleet. for the defence of Brundusium, and the sea-coast thereabout of Calabria, and made report that Philip first affaied to win Apollonia, and was come up the river with one hundred and twenty light gallies, or foilts with two ranks of oares against the stream; and afterwards, seeing he, ould not effect his purpose so speedily as he hoped, privily by night he approached with his army to Oricum: and that the City, fituate upon a plain, neither throughy fenced with walls nor well manned with fouldiers, nor yet furnished with armor and munition, was at the first assault surprised n and won. And as they recounted these news for they belought him to grant aid and succour; and to make head against this undoubted enemy of the Romans, either by Land or tor es at Sea, and to chase him away from them: who for no other reason were by him assailed, but because they were neer neighbors to Italy, M. Valerius leaving the guard of that place to T. Valerius his Lieutenant General, with a fleet of ships well rigged turnished & appointed; and having embarked these fouldiers (which the gallies for war would not receive) in the merchants thips of burden, arrived at Oricum on the second day after: and finding that City kept with a small and slight gatrison, which Philip when he departed from thence had left there, recovered it without much relitance. Thither repaired to him embaffadors from Apollonia, who brought word that they were befreged, became they refused to revolt from the Romans: and were not able to hold out any longer against E the forcible attempts of the Macedonians, unless a garrison of Romans were fent unto them. He promiled to effect whatfoever they defired, and so thipped a thousand electand choice souldiers in gallies, and fent them to the mouth of the river, under the conduct of a Captain of Allies Navius Crisbus, an industrious man, and an expert souldier. He having landed his men, and sent the gallies back to Oricum (from whence he came) to the rest of the Armado, conducted his fouldiers higher in the country, far from the river fide, by a way that was not beletnor held by the Kings forces: and in the night-feafon, unawares to all the enemies, entred the City. The day following they rested, only the Captain took a survey of the youth and able men of Apellonia, of their armor and the munitions and forces of the City. When he had feen and perufed all thereupon he was well appaid and encouraged to fight, and withall he had learned by the flouts and spies, how retchless, Fidle, and negligent the enemies were without So at midnight he went forth of the City without any noise, and entred the Camp of the enemies so carelesly guarded as it was, and lying so open: that by credible report, there were above one thouland men got within the trench and rampier, before that any one was ware thereof; and if they had held their hands, and not faln to killing, they might have passed on still even as far as to the Kings Pavilion. But by reason that they slew the warders next the gates, the enemies were railed: what even on, they were all fo frighted and terri-fied that not only there was never a fooldier rook we good in hand, and went about to repulle the enemy out of the Camp: but even the King himlelf, half naked as he was, and newly wakened out of his fleep, clad in simple apparell, scarce du ent for a common fouldier, much lets, I wot, for a ~ King, was fain to run toward the river fide to his frips. Thicker also the other multitude fled dif-G ordered in heaps. There were not many under three thouland either flain or taken prisoners in the camp. Yet there were more by odds of the enemies taken than killed. In the rifling of the camp the Apollonians met with Catapults and Balifts, and other engins provided for the affault of the City, which they conveighed all to Apollonia, to serve for desence of their walk against the like occasion of needfull service. All the booty besides of the camp was granted the Romans.

Tidings hereof being come to Oricum, M. Valerius preferrly fet forth the frimado as far as to the mouth of the river, that the King might not flie away and cleape by fea with his ships: where-upon Philip districting his power as well by fea as shore, and doubting he was not able to match Pp 2 the Romans, drew up fome of his fhips to land, fet fire upon the reft, and so by land went into Ma-H cedon, with a great port of his souldiers disarmed and spoiled. The Roman steet wintered at Orisonn with My Jaterius.

The same year in Spain the affairs went variably on both sides, For before that the Romans pasfed over the river Iberus, Mago and Asarubal deteated a mighty host of Spaniards, so as all the farther part of Span had faln from the Romans, but that P. Cornelius made hafte to transport his army over Iberus, and came in good time to fettle the wavering and doubtfull minds of the allies. At the first the Romans encamped at " Costrum Alium, a place memorable for the death of great Amilear. The Castle was well fortified, and thither afore they had conveyed corn. But because all those quarters thereabout were full of enemies, and fundry times their Cavalry had charged the Roman footmen, and gone clear away without any harm, whereby there had been flain at times uponewo thouland of them, which either made small hatte away, and staid behind, or straggled loofely over the fields: the Romans departed from thence, nearer unto places of more fecurity and peace, and fortified themselves in camp upon the mount of Victoria, Thithercame Cn. Scinio with all his forces, and likewile Afdrubal the fon of Gifgo, the third Captain of the Carthaginians, with a ful army. And they all encamped beyond the water, over against the fort of the Romans abovefaid. P. Scipio, accompanied with certain light armed fouldiers, was gone out closely to discover and take view of the places thereabout: howbeit, not fo covertly, but he was espied by the enemies, and (no doubt) they had put him to a shrewd foil in the open plain champian, but that he took a little hill thereby for his vantage. Where he was environed and befet round about: but by w the coming of his brother Cneus, he was delivered out of that danger.

Callalo, a famous and strong City in Spain, and so near linked in affinity to the Carthaginians. that Annibal from thence married his wife, ranged to the Romans. The Carthaginians cameagainst Illiturgum, and began to assault it because a garrison of the Romans lay there: and like they were to be Mafters of the town, by occasion especially of a great dearth and scarcity of victuals within. But Cn, Sip o for to relieve his friends and the garrison, went out with a legion lightly appointed with carriages, and marching between the two camps of the enemies skirmished with them flew many of them, and entred the City. The morrow after he fallied out, joyned in fight with the enemy, and feed as well: fo as in both battels there were flain of them above twelve thoufand in the place, more than ten thousand taken prisoners, and 36 military entigns carried away. T Thus the fiege brake up at Illiturgum, After this, the Carthaginians began to lay fiege unto Bigerra(a City also confederat with the Romans.) But Cn. Scipio at his coming raised that fiege without any conflict. Then the Carthaginians from thence went forward against Munda, and the Romans followed them thither straight after. There they encountred together and fought a set battel with banners displayed, for the space well-near of four hours. And as the Romans bare themselves bravely and had got the better, and were at point of the victory, the retreat was founded, by occation that Cn. Scipio was hurt fore in his thigh with a barbed javelin, and the fouldiers about him were greatly afraid that the wound was deadly. But no doubt, if it had not been for that flay and hinderance the very camp of the Carthaginians might that day have been forced. For not only the fouldiers, but the Elephants also were driven already so far as the trench, and even there upon the very bank, 39 of them were flicked with darts and pikes. In this battell likewife were killed (by report) twelve thouland men almost three thouland taken prisoners, and 57 military engines won. Then the Carthaginians retired back to the City Aurina, and the Romans followed upon them, because they would give them no time to rest and breath themselves after their fright, Where Scipio being brought into the field in a litter, gave them battel the second time, and got the victory clear: but fewer of the enemies were flain by the one half than afore, because there were not fo many in number left to fight, But (as they are a nation given naturally to renew war, and to be ever fighting, and cannot give over) they foon repaired and made up their forces. For Afdrubal had lent his brother Mago, to levy and gather new fouldiers: whereupon they took fresh heart again to try another field. These, being for the most part other souldiers (new come) fought N as it were in revenge, and to uphold that fide which in few daies space had so often taken the foil. and demeaned themselves as couragiously as they before, and sped as untowardly. For there were flain of them above eight thousand, not many under one thousand taken captives, with military enfigns 58. In rifling of them there was found very much spoil of the Gauls, as rings of gold, carkanets, collars, and bracelets great store. Over and besides, two great Lords and Princes of the Gauls, whose names were Manicaptus and wil marus, were flain outright in that conflict. Eight Elephantstaken alive, and three killed.

Now when as the affairs in Spain went thus forturally with the Romans, they began at length for very shame to thinke of Sagnutum, a town that was the cause of all these wars, and had now she years already been in the hands and possession to the enemy. Whereupon by force of arms of they recovered it, drave out of the town the garrison of the Carthaginians, and restored it again to the ancient inhabitants, as many as remained alive, and had cleaped these broils of war. As son the Turdetans, is no were the occasion of the wars between the Sagnutins and the Carthaginians, they subdued them, and brought them under their subjection, sold them in portsale, and destroyed their Circulatery. These were the archievances in Spain, during the time that Q. Fabina and M. Chuadius were Consilis.

And the death of one of them, namely, P. Furius, was the cause that they could not accomplish the lessing and numbring of the Citzeus. And when M. Attilius surrendred up his Magistracy, Q., Fabius Max. held the folegun

B affembly and Patliament of the people for the election of Confuls, wherein were created Q.Fabius Max, the Conful his ion, and T. Sempronius Gracebus the fecond sime, both ablent. For Prators, there were elected M. Attilius, and with him, they who at that time were Ædiles of the thair to wit, P. Sempronius Tudanaus, Gn. Fulvius Continuous, and M. Emplius Levidus.

This year as it appeareth in old Records, were the Stage-plaies first let out ythe Ædiles of the chair, and continued four daies. This Ædile Tuditanius above-named was he who at Cannel when all besides him for sear were astoniced in that would calamity) brake forcibly through the midst of theemenies, and escaped. When Q. Fabius the old Consul had finished the Election then the new Consuls Elect were sent for to repair unto Rome, and they entred their Migistracy. Then they assembled the Senat for to consult and take order for the war, for the Provinces as well their own,

C as those that were under the Prators: also concerning the armies, and the disposition of every charge and place of command. So the Provinces and armies were divided in this wife: The war with Annibal, whereloever it fell out, was committed to the managing of the Coff, with the charge of one army, which Sempronius himself had before under his conduct: and of another, commanded by Fabins the Conful. And thole were two legions. M. Emylins the Prætor, whole lot it was to have the jurisdiction over the forreiners, had committed his authority unto his Collegue Arilius, the Prator of the Citizens of Rome, that he might govern the Province about Luctria, and those two legions, over which Q. Fabius, now Conful, had the command, whiles he was Prator. To Sempronius the Prator befell the Province of Ariminum. To Cn. Fulvius was allotted Sueffula, with two legions likewife: fo as, Fulvins should have the leading of the legions D of Citizens, and Tudit anus receive his from M. Pomponius. The government of the forrein Provin es continued still in the former deputies. M. Claudius ruled Sigily, so far as the dominion of King Hiero extended: and Lentulus the Vice-Prator had the charge of the old Province. T. Oftacilius was high Admiral of the Navy, without any new supply or augmentation of forces, M.Valerius was employed in Greece and Macedony, with one legion, and the Armado which he had before. Q. Mutius was L. Deputy in Sardinia, having under him the old army, confifling of two legions. And C. Terentius had the administration of the affairs in Picenum, with that one legion levied of Allies and Affociats. With these Captains and these forces above faid they provided for E the defence and maintenance of the State and Empire of Rome, against many wars at once, either in hand already, or sufpected shortly. The Combis having enrolled two legions of Citizens, and chosen a supply to make our the rest, before that they serioot out of the City produced the pacification of the gods, for the seasiall and prodigious tokens that were reported. For the wall and gates of Rome were blasted and sinitence with lightning from heaven: and likewise the Temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Other vain objects and illusions also of the eyes and ears, which men imagined they saw and heard, were beleeved for truths. Namely, there appeared in the river of Tarracian certain resemblances and shows of Gallies, whereas indeed there were none such. And into Temple of Jup Vicilinia, which standed in the Territory of Coffs there was heard, for footh, rustling of armor: and the river of Amiternal seemed to tun with blond. When satisfaction was a made for the street of Amiternal seemed to a sun with blond. When satisfaction was a made for the street of Street, the gods bested and all well actions account and the street of Street and all well are a serious executions as the street of the serious control of the serious contro which long time he had been Captain of. Moreover, it was decreed and agreed upon that there should be mustred and enrolled two new legions of Citizens, and twenty thousand men besides

F made for these strange signs, the gods pleased, and all well again, according to the direction set downly the Prices and Prelates, then the Consuls set forward in their expedition, Sempronius into Lucainia, and Fabius into Apulia. Where it sell out, that Fabius the father repaired into the Camp at Sueffula, as Lieusenant and assistant out obssion. And when Fabius the younger went forth to meet him, and his Ser jeants or Ushers marching alore, said nor a word to Fabius the sheen one put him assist to give way, so very reverence of his person, (such majesty he carried) the old man rode forward, and passed by eleven of the said Lickors with their bundles of rods. Then the Consul commanded the Ser jeantchat was next himself to do his office: and with that slid Usher called upon old Fabius, to alight from his horse back; and at last, he let foor aground: I did all this but to try, quoth he, my son, whether you knew well that you were a Consulor no.

G "Therecame that night terrely to the Contal while the Camp lay there, one Caffus Alinius, and Arpinate, with his three bondflaves, promiting, that it is might have a good reward for his "terrice, he would betray Arps, into his hands. Fahis then propoted this matter turto his "Councill, to be debated of, Some were of opinion, that Altinius was to be whipped and put to "death signitive remongate and falle knowe as he was: a commonenemy, and a dangerous to either part, and playing with both hands, like a double-heartechypocrite. Who lift, after the over"throw as Cahna (as if he might turn with the wheel of fortune, and go from his word and faith"full promife, and change ever as the changeth) ranged himself turto Annihal; and by his exam"ple drew with him Arporto revolt and rebell : now after that he feeth the Romanestate to rife to again and hold up head (and that beyond his hope & contrary to his defires) he would play the " villain and turn toat again, and come with a new practice of a more shamefull treason than be-"fore ras if treachery and fallhood were of the nature and quality of a judgment paffed in Sener temviral court : and as if he might be allowed to carry two faces under a hood, and alter every "hour. Faith'eis friend that he is, not to be trufted, and flippery enemy not to be regarded. A good deed it were, that together with that lame traitor of Falerii, and the other of King Pre-"hu, he made a third, and were punished accordingly for exemplary justice, to teach all rogues and runnagates hereafter how they run from their Lords and Masters. On the other side, old Fa-"bing (the Conful's father) replied, and faid, That men now adaies had torgot how to make diffe. " tence of seasons, and in the very hear & midit of wars, reasoned and gave their opinion and cen- I "fure of every thing and perion as in a free time of open peace: when as indeed, we are to think. "consider, and deliberate of this point, that (if possibly it might be) no more of our allies re-" volt from the people of Rome, rather than invite and incite them thereto : and after one is flar-"ted alide, and upon repentance returned again to the ancient amity, to fall a reviling and rebuking of him and bitterly to fay that he deserveth to be made an example to all others. For if it "may be lawfull for one to turn from the Romans, and held unlawfull to return again unto the Romans no man need doubt, but shortly the Roman Empire will be for faken of all her confederats and allies, and we shall lee within a while all the Cities of Italy linked and confedered in "fact league and friendship with the Carthaginians. And yet (quoth he) I am not the manthat "thinketh Altinius worthy to be trufted in any thing for all this, but I would take a mean course K "&middle way between both extremities. My opinion is therefore that for the present he should be taken neither for enemy nor friend, but commanded to ward, and to have the liberty of a " prisoner, and only be kept forth-coming in some confederat and truthy City, not far from the Eamp during the time of the war. And when the war is once finished and ended, then I hold it " good to deliberate and confult, whether that his former revolt hath delerved more punishment than this his pre ent return meriteth favour and grace. Every man liked well of this advice of old Fabins, and gave their affent. So he was bound with chains and both himself and his company delivered over and put incustody, and a good roun sum of gold, which he then had brought with him, was by commandment referred for his use. At Cales he made his abode: where all the day time he filed to walk at liberry, with his keepers following him, but in the night they kept him L close prisoner. But at Arpi, where his home was, they of his own house began first to miss him. and seek for him : afterwards, when it was notifed throughout the whole City, that he was our of the way, and could not be found: the same hereof couled a tumult, for the loss of a principall perfor as he was thus revolted to the enemy. And for fear of an alteration in the State, prefently the news thereof was fent to Annibal. Who was nothing offended thereat, both because long afore he had the party himself in jealousie and supition, as one neither fish nor flesh, a man of no credistand hardly to be trusted: and also for that he found a good occasion and quarrel to seize upon the goods of fo rich and jubitantiall a Citizen and to make fale thereof. But to the end that the world might think that he was more anery against his person, than greedy of his substance, he joyned with cruelty, a grave course also of judicial leverity, that the one might serve as a file to M give lustre to the other. For having tent for his wife and children into the Camp. first he examined them straightly, for to know whither he was fled, and what store of filver and gold he had lest behind him at home in his house: and when he had learned enough of them touching every particular, and as much as he defred he burnt them quick to ashes. Fabins being departed f. om Saeffula purpofed the first thing that he did to assail Arpi. Where he lay encamped a mile from the town: and after he had well viewed by near approach, the fi-tuation of the City and confidered the wall, look where he law it was most strong and sure, and therefore guarded most slightly and negligently, there especially he purposed to give the hottest askult. And when he had infliciently provided and got together all ordnance and engins, requifixe for the battery of Ctics, he made choice of the most hardy and valiant Centurions of the M whole army and fet over them certain Tribunes and Marshals, valorous and doughty good men, and appointed unto them a Regiment of fix hundred fouldiers (for fomany he thought sufficient for the present service) with direction and commandment, that when the trumper sounded the relief of the fourth watch they should bring scaling ladders to that place aforesaid. Now there flood a gate low and narrow, answering to the fireet not much used and frequented, by reason that quarter of the City was not inhabited, but flood void. That gate he gave them order first to scale and clime over, and then to go forward on the wall, and from within-forth to breakdown the bars, and level the faid gate, and when they were Masters of that quarter of the City, then to wind the horn, and give fignall to the rest of the torces for to approach and come hard to the town, faying, That he would have all things in readiness, and in good order. This direction was o performed accordingly with great diligence, and that which was thought and feared would have been an hindrance and let unto them in the action, was the only thing which he'ped them most, that they were not descried. And that was a smoothing shower of rain that began after midninghr, which cauled the warders and watchmento quit their flandings, forfake the Sentinels, and to file into the houses for covert. The first notic of the storm pouring down with such a force, made that the rumbling of the fouldiers could not be heard, as they were breaking down the gate; and

A as it grew after to rain more foftly, and to kept flill at one, it founded gently and (weetly in their ears, untill it brought a good many of them fait afleep. Now after they had feized the gate, the Marthals gave order. That the Cornecties should be bestlowed in that void it rect aforestiad, distant equally at under, and to wind their horns, for to waken and raise the Consul. Which being done, according as it was before agreed, the Col. commanded the standards and ensigns to be brought forth; and somewhat before day-light entred at the fail droken gate into the City, With that, the enemies at length began to rouse themselves, for now the shower and storm was past, and the day approached. There was a garision in the City at hand of five thousand of Annibal his soludiers, armed and well appointed; and the Arpins of themselves were 3000 strong. Those

B the Carthaginians put in the forefront, as a foriorth ope, and opposed them against the enemy, for sear of some treacherous prank that they might play behind their backs. First, they began to arrange themselves to sight in the dark, blind, and marrow lanes. For the Romans had filled and taken up not only all the firects, but also the houses that were next the gate, to the end, they might not begauled with shot, and wounded from alost, a Some Arpins and Romans sell at length to meet, to take knowledge and acquaintance one of another, and to began to commune and task together. The Romans asked what the Arpins meant to rebell; for what offence and harm given of the Romans, and for what defer and benefit received from the Carthaginians should they sheing naturall Italians) maintain war for Aliens, strangers, and barbarous nations, against the Romans their old friends and ancient Allies; and so to bring study in subjection to Affrick, to do ho-

C mage and fealty, yea, and to become tributary, and to pay pension unto it? The Arpins excused and cleared themselvessaying, that they simple men, and ignorant in all things) were bought and fold by their great rulers and principall Citizens, and lived in manner ascaptives and flavs maker the command of some sew persons that might do all. Upon this beginning, more and more of them grew to parling and conference, At length the Prattor of Arpininess was by his own people and Citizens brought and presented before the Consoli-where, after tainfull promise passed between the ensigns and the battels; the Arpinsimmediatly bent their forces on the Romans side against the Carthaginians. The Spaniards likewise (who were not many under a thousend men) after they had capitulat and agreed with the Roman Consoli, nothing but this one article, That the garrison of the Carthaginians might be sent forth and pais away safe without barm:

Deame with their colours to the Conful. Then all the gates were fet open for the Carthaginians of depart; and being fent away upon fafe confue? without any harm at all or thamage unto Annilal arrived at Salapia, Thus Arpi was reflored again to the Romans, without the los and detriment of any one man but one only o'd traitor and new fugitive revolt. The Spaniards were appointed to have double allowance of victuals; and they performed good Mithfulls and valiant service manytimes after to the Common-weal.

When one of the Confuls was in Apulia, and the other in Lecania, one hundred and twelve men of arms, Gentlement of the Nobility of Cassas, having licence granted by the Magistrates to go out of the City, pretending to make a rode into the enemies country; and to tetch in booties and prizes, came directly into the Romans Camp Jying about Suessal. And meeting with the Ecorp de guard, declared who they were, and that they would parl with the Lord Departy. Now Cn. Fulvius was the General and Commander of the army there: who being advertized and certified hereof gave order that ten only of all that number midd be brought before him marmed. When he heard their suit and demand, which was nothing the but that when Copua was recovered by the Romans, they might have their goods reftored unrothem: he received them all irrob his protection. The other Practocallo Sempronius Tuditasus, won by force the town Clairing where there were taken prisoners above seven thousand men: and a good deal of copper and filver coin gained besides. At Rome there chanced a searfull and pitiful sire, which continued two nights and one whole day. All between S. Iuwa and the gate Carmentasis, together with the Equimalium and the steet Jugarium, were burned down, and made even with the ground. Likewise Fwithout the gate the fire spred far all about, and in the Temples of Fortuna and Dame Matuta, and Spers, onlumed much, as well hallowed as prophane.

The same year, when all things prospered well and had good success in Spain, P, and Cn, both Sepins having recovered many affociats and those of ancient league that came in again to him and yielded themselves; and besides, gained fome new consederats: conceived good hope, and took heart to proceed sarther, even into Affrick.

Stephaw King of the Numidians, on a fudden fell out with the Carthaginians, and became their professed enemy. Unto him the Scipios addressed three Centurians as Embassidadors, to treat with him about a league and alliance: and to promise withall, that if he went on still to trouble and moselt the Carthaginians by making war upon them, he should do an high favour to the Senate and people of Rome: that they would endeavour and bring about, that in good time and place. Che should be well required for that kindness, and receive at their hands a double recompence with thanks. This embassiage pleased the barbarous King right well. And after he had conferred and reasoned with the Embassidors, concerning military affairs, and the knowledge of warfare: and heard those old & experienced souldiers talk of war, he soon found his own warms, and how unskilbult himself was in many points and feats of arms, in comparition of that methodical and orderly discipline, whereof they had discoursed. "The first thing then that he requested at their shades, was this: That as they were good friends and faithfull Allies, two of them would go

" back with their Embaffie unto their Generals, and that the third might remain with him, to H eread unso him a lecture in the military science of warfare, Saying, that the nation of the Numi-"dians were raw and altogether unskilful in footmens service, and only nimble and prachied in "fight on horieback, So (quoth he) from the first beginning of our nation have our ancestors used " to war: & fo have we from our childhood been enured to fight, Mary, an enemy I have truffing "and prefuming much upon his Infantry, whom I would gladly be able to match every way in all "kind of fervice, Footmen I am able to fet out as well as another: for why? my Realm is po-"pulous, and yieldeth abundance of men : but altogether ignorant we are, how to fit them with armor, how to marshall them, how to order and set them in battell array: insomuch as all my "people in battell go to it pell-mell, and are as a multitude hudled and thrumbled together at a I " venture without skill without diferetion and advisement. The Embassadors answered and said. That for the present they would do according to his will and pleasure: but withal, they had his faithful promife & word of a Prince that he should immediatly fend back their companion again, in case their Generals approved not their deed in that behalf, Q. Statorius his name was, that slaid behind with the King, So Syphax fent by the two Romans his answer to the foresaid Embassage into Spain: and besides, with them other Numidians, Embassadors of his own to receive farther assurance and security from the Roman Generals : unto whom he gave in charge, that forthwith they should sollicit, perswade, and entice all the Numidians that were auxiliary souldiers unto the Carthaginians, and lerved in any Camp, City, or garrison Town of theirs, for to abandon them and come to him. And Statorius for his part, having mustered a great multitude of serviceable young K men, chose forth and enrolled a power of footmen, to serve in the Kings wars: and when he had forted them into bands and companies, and ordred them in battell array, as near as possibly he could, to the manner of the Romans: he trained them in their running to follow their colours: he taught them to keep their places in their ranks, and to double their files: and likewise he accultomed them to travell and do work: and so acquainted them with other military orders and exercises, that within short time, the Kingreposed as good confidence, and was as mighty in his new Infantry as in his old Cavalry : and in a fet pitched field on even ground, was able to meet the Carthaginian with banner displaied, and give him the foil in a full battell. The coming of the Kings Embaffadors into Spain, was to the Romans also a matter of great consequence and importance : for upon the rumour and fame that went thereof the Numidians began to fail away apace. L and to come thick unto the Romans. Thus were the Romans joyned in amity and friendship

When the Carthaginians had intelligence of this new alliance, they addressed immediatly their Embaffadors to Gala, who raighed in another part of Numidian over a nation called Maffyla. This Gala had a son named Masanissa, of seventeen years of age, but a youth of such towardness, and to forward in vertue, that even then he made good and apparant shew, that he would another day enlarge his dominion, and make a more flourishing and mighty Kingdom than his father should leave it unto him. These Embassadors declared unto Gala, " That for a much as Syphax "had entred league, and was banded with the Romans, to the end that by their alliance and fo-"ciety, he might be more mighty and puissant against other Kings and nations of Affrick: it M Were also better for him and much more commodious to joyn with the Carthaginians in all "Convenient speed: before that either phase passed over into Spain, or the Romans into Affrick:
"And Spana" (tay they) may soon be releasted and overthrown now, while that he hath gained "naught yet, but the bare name of the Roman League. Gala was foon perswaded to send a power of men especialy at the earnest instance of his son, who was very desirous of that war, and to have the managing thereof. He with the help of the Carthaginian legions vanquished Syphax, and gave him a great overthrow, So as at that field there were flain, by repoort, in one day thirty thousand. Syphan himself in person, with some sew Numidian horsemen fled back to the Maurisians, that inhabit the farthest coasts, hard upon the Ocean over-against Gades. But the barbarous people at the fame of his coming foreforted in great numbers to him out of all parts, that in a short space N he was able to arm a mighty hoft. And before he could with them cross over into Spain, which was divided from Affrick with a narrow arm of thesea, Masanissa was come with his victorious Army: who in that place, of himself, without any help or aid of the Carthaginians, gave Syphax battell to his great honour and fingular glory. In Spain no memorable exploit was atchieved, but that the Roman Generals allured and drew to them the able and serviceable manhood of the Celtiberians, for the same hire and stipend that they bargained for with the Carthaginians: and fent from thence above three hundred Spaniards of the noblest parentage into Italy, to follicit their countrymen, who lerved under Annibal as auxiliaries to follow them and take part with the Romans. This only, touching the affairs of Spain that year, is a thing worthy to be noted and remembred, That the Romans never waged fouldier to serve in their War before that time, when O the Celtiberians began to be their mercenaries, and first received pay,

The Breviary of L. Flores upon the five and twentieth Book.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, furnamed afterwards Africanus, was made Ædile, before he was of law-full years, Annibal won the City Tarentum (all but the Cafile, into which the Roman garrifon was resired) by means of certain young Tarentine Gen:lemen, who had made femblance, that they went by night a hunting. The folemn plaies in the honour of Apollo, were now first instituted, upon occasion of certain propheticall verses of Martius, wherin the overthrow at Canna had been foretold. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius Conful, fought fort unately against Hanno, a Duke or Captain of the Carthagini-Cans, T. Sempronius Gracchusthe Pro-Conful, was by a Lucan (his hoft that gave him entertainment) trained into the danger of an ambulh, and flain by Mago. Centenius Penula, who kad ferved in the wars as a Centurion, having made fuit unto the Senat, to have the leading of an army, and promifed. if this petition were granted to win the victory of Annibal andto vanquish him tock the charge of eight thousand footmen, and gave battell to Annibal: but he was stain himself, and his who'e army defeated and put to the fword. Cn. Fulvius the Prator fought unfortunately against Annibal, and loft the fill: in which fight there died fixteen thousand men. Himself, with two hundred horsemen fled and escaped, Capua was besieged by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius, the Confuls. Claudius Marcellus in the third year of the flege won Syracule, and bare himself in that servicelike a worthy and noble Knight In that tumult and hurly-burly when the City was taken, Archimedes, whiles he was buffly occupied Dabout certain Geometrical figures and forms that he had drawn in the dust, was killed. The two Scipios, Publius, and Cornelius, efter fo many and so worthy exploits performed fortunately in Spain, came to a wofull and heavy end, being themselves stain there, with the less well-near of their whole Armies, in the eighth year after that they went into Spain. And the main possession of that Province had been quite loft, but for the fingular manhood and industry of L. Martius, a Knight of Rome. who having rallied and gathered together the remnants of the armies, so encouraged them, that by their valiant service two several encamped holds of the enemies were won seven and thirty thousand of the enemies flain, and eighteen hundred taken prisoners, and a great rich booty obtained. Whereupon he was called Captain Martins.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

·Hiles these affairs thus passed in Affrick and in Spin, Annibal emploied the summer season in the territory of Tarentum, in hope by treason to be Master of the City of the Tarentins. In which mean while certain base Cities of the Salentins. and towns of no importance revolted unto him. And at the fame times of those twelves States of the Brutii, which the year before had turned, and banded with the Carthaeinians, the Confentins and Thurins were rallied wholly again to the devotion of the people of Rome. And more of them had returned likewile, but for L. Pomponius Veientanus Captain of the Allies: who after he had made certain rodes into the country of the Brutii, and feed his hand I well with many booties, took upon him the countenance of a sufficient Colonel, and was no less reputed and having gathered a power of men, suddenly in haste, without good advisement, fought with Hanno. In which conflict, a mighty multitude of his men were either flain or taken priloners. But, as good hap was, they were but a difordered unruly rabble of ruffical clowns and bondflaves: and the least loss of all other, was the Captain himself, who amongst the rest was taken captive: a man as then, the author of a rath and fool-hardy fight, and had been aforetime a Publican or farmer of the City revenues, and alwaies (through his naughty practites and cunning ferthes and shifts wherein he was become skilful) a disloyal person and dangerous both to the publike State, and also to those private companies and societies, with whom he had commerce and dealing. Sempronius the Conful lying in the Lucans country made many light skitmishes, but not Gany one worth remembrance, and woncertain poor towns, and of imal regard, belong ng unto the

The longer that this war continued lingring, whiles prosperous success and adverse mishap interchangeably wrought much variety and alteration as well in the inward minds of men; as in their outward state and fortune: since religious zeal and superstition (and the same for the most part in forcein ceremonies) had so seized & possessed the City, that either the men or gods theros, were suddenly all at once become clean altered and transfigured. Insomuch as now the Roman rites and holy observations were contemned, not only inserter, & within doors at home in their private private houses, but abroad also in the open streets, yea, and in the common place and Capitoli: wherethere flocked alwaies a fort of women that neither offered facrifice and oblations, nor faid their praiers, and did their devotions according to the use and custome of their native country and City. Certain odd Priests and Chaplains, yea, and doting wizards and blind Prophets, had inveigled the minds and confciences of men: whose number was the greater by reason first of the rural people and peafants of the country, who for need and poverty, and for fear together, were driven to quit their lands which they had not tilled and husbanded, by reason of the long wars, and many invalions and rodes that laid all waste, and so retired into the City: afterwards by the ease occupation and ready means of gain which they found by the errour of others, whom they foon seduced and abused: which trade they used and practised openly, as if it had been a I lawfull art and myflery. At the first divers good and honest persons began secretly to grieve and be offended herewith, yea, and to mutter and utter their griefs in private: but afterwards inprocess of time the matter was presented before the LL. of the Councill, and brake forth to open complaint in publike places. The Ædiles and Triumvirs Capitall were blamed much and sharply rebuked of the Senate, for not redreffing these disorders: and when they went in hand to rid the common place of this multitude; and to cast down, over-turn, and sling away the preparation and provision for their factifices and oblations, they had like to have been mituled and milchieved by the people. When this malady and miforder feemed now so be greater than might be remedied and reformed by the meaner and inferiour Magistrate, M. Emylius, Prator of the City for the time being received Commission by order from the Senate, to see that the people were eased K and delivered from this new religion and superflition. He not only read unto them in a publike affembly the decree of the Senate in that behalf, but also made proclamation, Imprimis, that whofoever had any books of prophenes or prayers, or treaties written of this art and kience of facrifices, should bring in all those books and writings unto him before the Calends of April next enitting. Item, that no perion should facrifice either in publike place, or sacred Church-after any new form or forcein rights and traditions. And in that year there died certain publike Priests, to wit, L. Cornelius Lexitulus the Arch Prelate, or high Priest: and C. Papyrius Masso, the son of Caus a Bishop, Also P. Furius Phalus an Augur and C. Papyrius Masso the ion of Lucius, a Decemvir deputed for holy mysteries. In place of Lentulus and of Papyrius were M. Cornelius Cethegus, and Cn. Serviling Cep of ubflitted high-Priest and Bishop. For Augusthere was created L. Quin- L tus Flaminius: and L. Cornelius Lentulus was choien Decemvir overtacred ceremonies and divine

Now the time drew near of the folemn election of new Confuls: but because it was not thought good to cal the old away, (bufied as they were in the wars) T. Sempronius one of the Confuls, nominated for Dictator, to hold that election aforelaid, C. Claudiur Cento, who named for his Generall of the Cavalry Q Fulvius Flaccus, This Dictator, the first comitiall day following, created for Confuls Q. Fulvius Flaccus abovenamed, his Generall of horsemen, and Ap. Claudius Pulcher, who in his Prætorship had the jurisdiction and government of the Province of Sicily. Then were the Prators elected, Cn, Fulvius Flazeus, C. Claudus N-ro, M. Junius Syllanns, and P. Cornelius Sulla, When the Election was ended the Dictator religned up his place. That year was Adile Curule, together with M. Cornilius Cethegus, one P. Cornelius Scipio, whole furname afterwards was Africanus. When he flood and made juit for the Ædilefhip, and the Tribunes of the Commons were against him, objecting that he was not eligible and capable of that office for that he was not of lawfull age to be a competitor, and to put in for it: If (quoth he) all the Quirites and Citizens of Rome will choose me Ædile, I have years enough on my back, Whereupon, in favour and furtherance of his fuit, there was such running and labouring on all hands to the Tribes for their voices that the Tribunes suddainly surceased their purpose to hinder him. And this was the largels and don tive that the Ædiles bestowed. The Roman Games were, according to the wealth of that time, exhibited and fer out with great flate and magnificence and continued one day longer than ordinary: and for every street throughout the City, was allowed a N * Conzins of oyl. L. Villius Tappul. s. and M. Fundanus Fundulus Ædiles of the Commons, accused certain dames and wives of the City beforethe people, of dishonest and incontinent life: and fome of them being condemned they forced into banishment. The Games called Plebeii, were renewed for two daies: and by occasion of these games a solemn feast or dinner was kept for the hon our of Jupiter. Then Q. Fulvius Flaceus the third time entred the Consulfhip, together with Appius Claudius: and the Prators call lots for their Provinces. It fell unto P. Cornelius Sulla his lot to have the jurisdiction both of Citizens and firangers, which before was executed by twain. To Cn. Fulvins Flaccus fell Apulia: to C. Claudius Nero was allotted Sneffula: and M. Junius Syllanus his hap was to have the sule of the Tuicans. The Confuls were appointed by decree of the Senate to war with Q Annib.1, and to have under their command two legions spiece: and that one of them should receive his legions of Q. Falius, the Cof. of the former year; and the other take his at the hands of Fulvius Centimalus. As for the Practors, Fulvius Flaceus had Commission for the conduct of the legions at Luceria, which served under Æmylins Prætor there: and Nero Claudius was to have the leading of those that were under the hand of C. Terentius in Picenum: and that they should provide themselves of supply to make up the full number of the Companies. M. Junius had the tharge of the legions of Citizens multred the year before to ferve in Tufeany: T. Sempronius Gracchingand P. Sempranius Tudit anus continued still in the government of their Provinces, the one of Lucania, the other of Gallia, and kept their own forces. Likewife P. Lentulus governed the old Province in Sicily: M. Marcellus was Lord Deputy of Syracuse, and so far as the Realm and Dominion of King Hiero reached, T.Oftacilim Admirall of the Navy, Greece was governed (til by M.Valerius Sardinia by Q. Musius Scavela, Spain by P. and Cornelius Scipios, To the old armies before there were other two new legions levied and enrolled by the Cost, so as in all the whole forces for that year amounted to 23 Legions.

When the Confuls hould multer the fouldiers, they were hindred by occasion of a lewd prank plaied by one M. Posthumius Pyrgensis, to the great trouble and disquict of the State and publike peace. This Posthumius was by his vocation and calling a Publican, who many years together for crafty and deceitfull dealing, for avarice and coverousness, had not his fellow in all the City, but it were L. Pomponius Veient anus again; the same man, whom the year before as he forraged the territories of the Lucans rashly and unadvisedly, the Carthaginians by the conduct of Hanno had taken priloner. Thele two (foralmuch as it was covenanted and indented before, that the transporting of those things which were for the provision of the armies beyond sea, should be warranted by the City against all danger of tempest; and that all dammage and lois of goods that way mifcarrying, should not lie upon the shoulders of the Publicans, who had undertaken by great to serve the armies, but be made good again out of the common Chell and Treasute:) these publicans (I [ay] not only gave falle information of certain (hipwracks, but allo if they brought word at any time truly of fome hips that were perified, they were first polynomials. time truly of some ships that were perished, they were such only as were lost by their own fraud and deceit, and not cast away by chance or violence of weather. For they would fraight & charge certain old veffels and shaken bottoms, with some sew wares of small or no worth at all, and suffer them to fink for the nonce in the deep fea, and fave the mariners and failers with small pinaces. and cockboats prepared aforehand for the purpose: and when they had done, lie shamfully and fay, that they had lost merchandise and commodities in those ships of sunday forts, and of great value. These cunning parts of theirs had been the year past revealed and notified to M. Emplius the Prator, and the Senat by him made acquainted therewith: howbeit there was nothing done, nor any act of Senat devised for the chastisement of the offender: because the LL of the Coun-Dill in no case would offend the company and society of these publicans and farmers, in such a time especially, when there was some need of them. Then the common people took the matter into their own hands, for to proceed with more leverity against these lewed and fraudulent prachiles, At length, two of the Tribunes of the Commons, Sp, and Lacius, both Carvilii, arole, up and shewed themselves. For seeing how odious and intamous an indignity this was, and not to be suffered, they brought M. Posthumius in question, and laid an action and set a fine upon his head, of two hundred thousand * Asses. When the day of triall was come, whether the fine aforesaid *624 lib, ster. should stand and be paid, or taken off and remitted; and that the Commons were assembled in so great number, that the great Court yard of the Capitol would fearcely hold the multitude : the defendant spake for himself and pleaded at large. But the only hope that he seemed to have was this, in case C. Servilius Sasca a Tribune of the Commons, a friend and near kiniman of Posthumius, would by vertue of his place come between and ftop the course of law for proceeding farther, before that the tribes and wards were called forth, to go together and to give their voices. The two Tribunes abovenamed, having brought forth the witnesses to depote, and their depositions being taken, commanded the people to void and make way: And the lottery casket or fosfer was brought forth to cast lots in what Tribes the Latines should give their voices. All this while the Publicans were earnest with Casca, to dissolve the assembly by one means or other, and put off the Court for that day. The common people on the other fide called on hard and gainfaid it, And as it fell out, Casca sat formost in one of the points and corners of the assembly. He wist not what to do his mind was so perplexed for shame of the one side, if he did not help his friend and kiniman, and for fear on the other fide, because he see the people so eagerly bent. The Publicans seeing Fimall hope of help in him, with full intent to make tome flir, and to trouble the Court, put forward forcibly and advanced themselves through a void way, seized upon an high place, and between the Tribunes and the people, rushed in upon them, and fell to quarrell and braul both with the people of the one fide, and also with the Tribunes on the other: insomuch as they were like to go together by the ears. Whereupon Fulvius the Conful, "See yenot (quoth he to the Tri-"bunes) how basely ye are accounted of and made of no better reckoning among them, than pri-"vate persons? See ye not a riot and mutiny toward, unless ye make haste and break up the af-" sembly ? So the Commons were dismissed, and a Senate called: Where the Consuls made relation unto the Lords of the Councill, and complained how the folemn Sefficin and Court of the The com-Commons, was by the audacious violence of the Publicans diffurbed: "That Court (I fay) plaints of the Ge wherein M. Posthumisus put in bail: and made default at his day. The then Tribunes called the Commons together preferred a bill unto them, which they granted to pass as an act, in this form : That if M. P. fibumius came not forth & made appearance before the * Calends of Min. and being cited and called that day, answered not to his name, and no lawfull excuse alleaged for his abience, they judged him to be a banished man, and therefore awarded his goods to be fold in port-fale and himself to be excommunicate, and interdicted the use of water and of fire; and to K lose the benefit of a Citizen for ever, This done, they began also to endite all those, one after another of a capitall crime, who were his abertors, and the movers and flirrers of a fedition and commotion of the people and to call for personal pledges. At the first they committed as many of them as could find no such fureties: and afterwards those also that were sufficient to put in bail, For the avoiding of which danger, most of them departed into voluntary exile. This was the end of the Publicans fraudulent dealing; and this was the iffue of their audacious enterprise, in defence and maintenance of their guile and deceit. After this, a folemn Court was called for the creation of the Arch-Prelate, and M. Cornelius

Cetherus newly elected Prelate, was the Prefident of this election. Three competitors there were, who fued for that Prelacy, and flrived earnefly one against the other: namely, Q. Fulvius Flaceus, L Conful for the time being, who also had before been twice Conful, and Censor besides; also T. Maclist Torquatas, a man of great reputation, for that he had been likewife dignified with a double Confulfhip, and one Centorthip; and last of all, P. Licinius Craffus, who as yet, was to tuefor the Ædileship: howbeit, this young man in that sute and contention was superiour, and carried it away from those grave, ancient, and honourable persons. Before him, for the space of an hono dred and twenty years, there had not been created any one, the highest Priest, (fave only P. Cornelius * Caluffa.) but had fit before in the Ivory Chair and born office of State. The Confid had much ado to go through with the Levy, and to enroll the full legion of fouldiers, by reason that the imall number of young and able men would hardly afford both to furnish out the new leg ons of Citizens, and also to supply and make up the old. Howbeit the Senate would not suffer M them to give over their enterprise which they were about, but agreed that there should be chofen two Ternions of Triumvits: the one fort of them to be fent out, within the compais of fifty miles every way from Rome, the other to go farther; with commission, to take good view and fittver both within that precinct and without, in all through-fares and market towns: inborough and places of frequent affemblies; of all persons of free condition that they could fet eye on: and fo many as they thought able men of body to bear arms, although they were not come to the lawfullage for lervice, to preis them for fouldiers. Also it was decreed, that the Tribunes of the Commons; if they so pleased, should put up a bill, that all under seventeen years of age, who had bound themselves by military oath, should have as good pay, as if they had been enrolled souldiers at seventeen years or upward. By vertue of this decree, the two Ternions aforesaid of the N Trinmvirs being chosen, made diligent search, and visited all the country over for free-born men accordingly.

At the same letters came from M. Marcellus out of Sicily, concerning the demands of the feoloidiers who served under P. Lensulus, and they were read in the Senate Houle, That siny consisted of the residue which remained after the field lost at Came, and was confined into they cashath been said aftore) with this condition, not to return back into Italy before the Pinick war should be ended. At the words they left down profirate at Marcellus his feet, Marcellus answered them, that he had neither power of himself. nor commission otherwise, to content them, and satisfies their request. However, write to the Senat he would: and according as the LL. should give advice and direction, so he would do and not fail. These letters (as I said before) were trought to the Confuls, and by them read in the Senat-house. And after deliberate consultation about their contents, the Senat passed this decree: That as concerning those sould be put in trust any more with the affairs of the Common-wealth: but if M. Claudius the Proconsult shought it good otherwise, he might do according to that which he judged convenient, and to stand with his own readit, and the sately of the State. Provided alwayes, that not one of them be dispensed with, and freed from service or charge of souldiery: nor rewarded with any military gift in testimony and token of his valour: nor yet reduced home again into service or sate enemy made abode there.

After this, the Pretor for the City, by vertue of a decree from the Senat, and an act of the Commons, affembled the people together. In which Seffion were created five Commissioners called Quinqueviri, for the reedifying and repairing of the turrets and the walls: Likewife two other, fraternities of Triumvirs, the one for taking an inventary of all facred things, and to fen and note all offerings and oblations: the other for reedifying the Temples of Fortune and dame Mainta, within the gate Carmenta'is, and like wife of Spes without the gate, which the year past were confumed by fire. Great and fearful tempells hapned this year. On the Alban mount it rained flores continually for two dayes. Many places were blaffed and fmitten with lightning from Heaven; and namely, two Chappels in the Capitol, and the Rampier about the camp and fort above Sueffula in divers places thereof: and two watchmen in their Sentinels flriken flark dead. The wall and certain terrets thereon at Cumes, not only limitten but also shaken down and overthrown with lightnings and thunder-boits. At Remethere was feen an huge flone to flie to 1 and fro in the air. The fun also appeared more red than it useth to bey and like to blond. In regard of these prodigious sights, there was a solemn Procession and supplication all one day: and the Confuls for certain dayes together, attended only upon Divine fervice of the Gods: and the Novendial Sacrifices were devoutly celebrated nine dayes together.

Now whereas a long time already both Annibal hoped, and the Romans also suspected that the Tarentins would revolt: there fell out between, an occurrence and outward accident, which hastned it the rather. There was one Philias a Tarentine, who having abode long at Rome under colour of an Embassador leger, a busy headed man, and of an unquiet spirit, one that of all things could not away, with reft and peace, in which to long as he lived he thought every day a year, and that now he was waxen old and aged therein; found means to have access unto the look tages of the Tarentins. Kept they were in the Close belonging to the Temple of Liberty, with M the less attendance and careful eye because it was expedient and good neither for themselves, nor for their City to make an escape, and deceive the Romans. These hostages he had oftentimes sollicited and perswaded by much talk and many reasons, and at length having bribed and corrupted two fextons and warder's of the faid Temple, he trained them forth in the evening out from the place where they were in lafe cust ody: and when he had accompanied them onward on the way as a guide, and directed them how to pais fecretly, he fled himfelf and they together. By day break the next morning they were miffed, and their escape was noised throughout the City: Whereupon, men were fent out after them from all parts, to fetch them in again: who having overtaken them at Tarracina, laid hold of them, and brought them back to Rome: where in the N Comitium, they were, by the content of the people, beaten with rods, and then thrown down headlong from the cliff Tarpeia.

The cruel igor of this punishment, cansed much anger; and provoked two of the noblest and most famous Grecian Cities in Fasty to indignation, not only in publick generally but also inprivate particularly: according as any man was either in bloud joyned; or in alliance and friendship linked to them who were thus foolly and shamefully put to death. Amorgst whom there were about thirteen noble Gentlemen of Topensum, conspired together and the chief of them were Nico and Philometers. These conspirators before they would fit ard enterinto any action, thought best to speak and confer with Anniel first; and so having gone forth of the City, ander a pretence is they went to the chase a huming, by night they came unto him. But when they drew need into the camp, the rest hid themselves within a wood neer unto the high way: Nico and Philometer only went forward to the watch, and there being taken (as they requested themselves) were brought before Anniela. Who when they had delivered unto him their complete and upon what occasions they entered into that designment they were highly commerced, and promised great rewards, and willed and charged by him. that to the intent they might be their contry-men shand, how they ever went out of the Cityto feeth in frome booties, they should drive afore them into the City, certain cattel of the Carthaginians, which were pur out to passure and seeding.

A and herewith gave them his word to do it fafely, and without any impeachment and resistance whensover. Thus these yong Gentlemen were seen to bring in good store of cattell: and as they were known to make this adventure the second time and oftner still, men marvailed the less at the matter, and suspected nothing. Now upon a new parling and communication with Annibal, they covenanted with him upon his faithful promise in the sterms. Imprimis, for the Tarentins themselves, to enjoy freely their Lands and goods, and live under their own laws. Item, to pay no pension not tribute unto Annibal, not be forced to receive a garrison against their wills. And last of all, to betray the garrison soulders of the Romans, and all their fortresses and places of strength deliver up into the hands of the Carthaginians. When these conditions and capitulations B were agreed upon, then Pholomeness used much of other to go forth and come in again in the night:

and as he was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that experies he had be one.

B were agreed upon, then Philometer tiled much oftner to go forth and come in again in the night and as he was known to be a great hunter, and much delighted in that exercise, he had his hounds following him hard at his heels, and all other furniture about him fit for huntimen: and lightly ever he took fome wild beaft or other with his hounds, or cliegot fomething from the enemy, that of purpose lay ready for his hands: and alwayes as he brought home ought with him, he would beltow it either upon the Captain of the Roman garrion, or deal it among the warders of gates, And they all, verily believed and were perfivaded, that his going out and in thus, most by night, was only for fear of the enemies. Now, when he had used this so accustomably, that he had made it an ordinary practile, in so much, that at what time of the night for ever he had but once lated or whistled the gate was streight set open for him: then Annibed thought it time, to put the C plot abovedaid in execution. Three dayes journey he was off; Where because he would have men the selfe marvail, why he kept a standing camp io long till in one place he selegiened and made him.

C plot abovesaid in execution. Three dayes journey he was off; Where because he would have men the leffe marvail, why he kept a standing camp to long still in one place he feigned and made himfelf fick. The Romans also, that lay in garrison at Ta entum gave over to suspect his long abode and leaguering there. But after that he was determined and rejolved to advance toward Tarentum, he picked out ten thousand foot and horsemen together, whom he supposed for nimble bodies, swift footmanship, and lightness of armor, to be most meet for expedition : and with them at the fourth watch of the night, he marched forward with his enigns. And having fent out afore-hand fourfcore Numidian light Horses, he commanded them, to ride about and scourall the waves on every fide, and to call their eye to elpie and diff over all the coaffs, that no country people a far off might descry and view the army on foor, but they thousd be seen: and withal, to D bring in, as many as were gone before, and kill all them they met and encountred: to the end that the Peafants there inhabiting, might think they were Theeves and Robbers, rather than the vantcurriers and fore-riders of an army. Himself in performarching with great speed and celetity, pitched his camp almost 15 miles from Tarentum. Neither would he there, be known unto his men of his purpose, nor tell them whither they should go: only he called his souldiers together, and charged them to hold on the direct way, and not infer any one to turn afide, nor in the march go out of his rank or file: and above all things, to be ready for to receive their charge and commandment from their Captains, and do nothing without their warrant and commission. As for himself, he would when he saw his time, let them know his mind, and what the service was that he would have done. And about the same very hour and instant, news came as far as Tarentum, that

E some sew Numidian Horsemen sorraged the country, and had put the villagers in great fright all about. At which tidings, the Captain of the Roman garrison was no more moved, nor made any other halt, but only gave order, that some of the Horiemen the next morning by day light should ride forth, to keep the enemy from farther excursions, In the mean time, they that had this charge, bare themselves so carelessy in providing themselves to execute that which they were commanded that contrary-wife, they took those outrodes of the Numidians for a good argument, That Annibal with his army was not dislodged, but abode still in leaguer where he lay first, Annibal when it was once dark and dead night, began to set forward. Ph. limenes was there ready to be his guide, loden with his game hunted as his manner was. The rest of his conspiracy waited their time to execute their several charges, as it was agreed among them. Now it was ordred between F them afore, that Philomenes coming in at the usual little wicket, with his venison that he had hunted, should bring in with him some armed men: and Annibal on another part, come to the gate called Temenia, which looked toward the East, and stood on the Land side of the City, a good way within the wall, as it were in a nook. When Annibal approached the faid gate, he made a fire, in token that he was come (as it was devised between them before) and it flamed forth and gave a shining light. The like did Nico again. Then the fires on both sides were put out, that they made no more blaze. And Annibal in great and still silence, led his army close to the gate. Nico came suddainly at nuawates upon the watchmen fast asleep, killed them in their beds, and opened that gate. Annibal entred with his Regiment of footmen, and commanded the cavalry to flay be-bind, to the end they might have liberty of open ground to ride, whitherfoever there was need, G and as occasion required. Now by this cime, Philomenes also was comencer to that little gate on the other side, where he used to make his egress and ingress to and fro. And when he had raised the watchman with his voyce so welknown, and with his whiftle where with now he was familiarly acquainted, & said withal, that he was troubled with tugging and lugging of a foul & heavy beaft: therewith the wicket was see open. Two lusty fellows there were carrying in the wild bore between them, and he himself followed with one of the huntsmen, lightly & nimbly appointed and whiles the watchman his eye was upon the two porters that carried the beaft, wondring at the bigness of the bore, and took no heed to himself, Nicom, thrust him through with his spear. Then tred in after them, about thirty men armed, who killed the rest of the watch, and brake downer. the great gates withal: and immediatly there entred the companies with banner diplayed and fo. forth from thence they were conducted and brought to the market place, without making any notic, and there joyned themselves to Annibal. Then Annibal divided two thousand Game into three Regiments, whom he fent into fundry parts of the City and gave order to the Tarentins and the Affricans to get possession of the most principal and populous places of the City and when the cry and shout was once up, to kill all the Romans whereforer, and to foare the Townsmen. But to the end that this might be orderly done, he gave direction to the yong Gentlemen aforelaid of Tarentum, that to loon as they espied a far off, any of their own Citizens and Country-men, they should bid them be quiet and still, to hold their peace, to be of good ; cheer and fear nothing. By which time, they began to let up a shout and cry, as men use to do in a City taken by affault, but what the matter should be no man of the Town or garrison could certainly tell. For the Tarentin inhabitants supposed verily, that the Roman souldiers of the garrison were risen up to fack the City: the Romans on the other fide, thought that the Townimen mutined, and they were in doubt of iome traiterous practife. The Captain himfelf awakened and raised at the first tumult, escaped to the key, where he took a small Barge or whirry-boat. and fled to the Caffle. The Trumpet also that sounded from the Theatre, made the greater terror: for it was both a Roman Trumper, provided aforehand for the purpose by those Traitors, and a Grecian blew it, one who had no skill; and to it was doubtful, both who he was that founded and who they were that he gave fignal unto. When day appeared, and the Romons faw the armour of the Carthaginians and Gauls then they wist well in what door the wind was, and how the World went: and the Greeks feeing the Romans lying along every where flain, were foon aware that the City was taken by Annib. I. But after it was broad day light, and that the Romans who remained unkilled, were fled into the Castle, and the noise and hurliburly began by little and little to flake and give over: then Annibal commanded the Tarentins to be called to ageneral affembly, and to present themselves without arms. When they were all come together, but only those who with the Romans were fled for company into the Caffle, there to abide in h fortune as they; Annib. I spake kindly unto the Tarentins, gave them good and friendly words, renearled with great proteflation what favors he had shewed to all their Citizens, whom he had taken prisoners either at Thrasymenus, or at Canna: and withal, after he had bitterly in eighed against the Lord y and proud rule of the Romans, he commanded every man to repair home to his own house and let his own name upon his doresfor that so many houses as had not the name written upon them of the Master thereof he would presently upon found of Trumpet, command to be rifled. Over and befides, that if any one should hap to write his own name, and set it on the door or lodging-house of a Roman (for he saw divers of their houses empty) he would take him for an enemy, and deal with him accordingly. After this speech ended, and the assembly dissolved, when the doors were marked with their titles and interiptions aforefaid, whereby the houles of friends and enemies were known diffinct yone from another: the figual was given by found of Trumpet: and then there was running every where from all parts to ranfack the lodgings of the Romans. And some prety sprinkling of piliage they met withal. The next day after he advanceda- M gainst the Castle to assault it, which after he saw impregnable and not possible to be won, either by forcible affault, or by artificial devices of fabricks and engins, by reason that both the Sea came to it, wherewith the greater part therof was compassed, in manner of a demy lland, and also fortified besides on another part with exceeding high and steep rocks: and withal, senced from the City with a strong wall and deep ditch: therefore, because he would neither let nor hinder himself from archiesing greater affairs, whiles he was carefully bufied onely about defending the Tarentins, nor yet leave them without aftrong guard, for fear left the Romans from out of the Caftle, might as their pleasure come upon them, he determined to raise a rampiar for a partition between the Cattle and the City, for their defence against the faid garrison. And he was not out of hope, but that when the Romans should offer to issue forth to hinder the faid work, they might also be N fought withal: and in case they adventured rashly to run on, and engage themselves too far, they might be cut off in their heat, & the forces of the garriton might be so diminished & abated by some great flaughter & execution that the Tarentins of themselves should be able with ease to defend their City against them. The said work was not so soon begun, but the Romans all of a suddain, set open the Castle gate, sallied forth & charged upon the pioners as they were labouring about their bolwark. The guard that attended for the defence of the workmen, and flood before their work, fell off and fuffered themselves to be put back, to the end that the enemies upon their first success, should be more adventurous : supposing that the further they gave ground the more of the other would follow after and chafe them. Which being perceived, the Carthaginians whom Annibal had kept close for this purpose, and had in readiness very wel appointed, rose out of all parts, and made (1) head again. Neither were the Romans able to abide their forcible violence. And flie they could not in multitudes by occasion that the straightness of the place would give no leave: and besides, many things lay in their way: partly the work that was begun, and partly, other provision of stuffe brought for the same, which mightily hindred and impeached them. Most of themsell headlong into the trench : and to be fort, more perished in their flight, than were killed in the fight. After this the fortification went in and again, and none durft venture to hinder it. So he call a mighty deep ditch, & railed an high rampier within it. Also behind it, a prety diffance off, he went in hand

A to build a mure or wall to it, in the very fame quarters that they might be able even without any guard at all, or strength of men, to defend themselves against the Romans. Howbeit, he left them an indifferent band of souldiers, which might withal help out somewhat in making of the wall. Himself then departed with the rest of his army as saras the River G. lesur (five miles off from the City) and thereencamped. From which slanding camp, he came back once again to survey the work: and finding that it went better forward than he looked for, he began to conceive some good hope that the citadel also might be won by sfaller. For why, it was not defended surely by situation on high ground, as others are, but seated on a plain and divided from the City, by a wall only and a ditch. Now when as it began to be affailed with fabricks, and artislery devised of all B forts, there happed a new supply to be lettiferen. Metapontum to aid the gartion: whereby the Romans took heart unto them, in so much as in the night time of a studian and before they were looked for, they set upon the stabricks and ordinance of the enemies planted thereupon: some they cast down and overthrew, others they fired and contamed. And there anend of Annibal his assault of the Castle from that side.

The only hope behind now, was in continual fiege: and yet that hope promifed no great effest, because they that held the Castle, had the Sea free at their command, all that side, whereas the faid fort (flanding as it were in an half Island) overlooketh the mouth of the haven and the City contrary-wife, was wholly feeluded from al entercourse of passage and commedities coming in by Sea, and liker were they that befieged the fortress, to feel the want and fearcity of victuc als than those that were besieged within ir. Then Anmbal after he had called together the principal citizens of Tarenum, laid open unto them all, the present difficulties, faying; "That he "neither faw any way to win by force the Cattle to firong and fortified as it was, nor had any "hope at all to gain it by fiege, fo long as the enemies were Lords of the Sea. But if they had "fhips once, whereby they might hinder and flay the coming in of their victuals and other "commodities, the enemies immediatly would either quit the peece, or yeeld themselves. The "Tarentins held well with that, and approved the device, But (lay they) he that giveth us that "counsel, must also affoord us means to effect the same. For the Carthaginian ships if they were "fent for, and fet out of Sicily might well do the feat: mary, as for our own which lie thut up "as it were, within a little creek and bay, confidering, that the enemy keepeth the mouth and en-D "try of the haven, how is it possible that they should get out from their harbour into the open "Sea, and pass without danger? Pass (quoth he?) Pass they shall, make no doubt of that. "Many things, I tell you, confidered in their own nature are cumber ome and difficult, but by "pollicy and wir of man are eafily welded and wrought with a fleight. Ye have a City here leated "upon a plain and champain ground, the wayes answering to every fide of it are even, large, and broad enough, yea, and open to all quarters. I will chute that way which croffeth the midft of "the City, and paffeth along to the haven and the Sea, and to will carry and transport the ships "upon wains, with no great ado and trouble. And so, both the Sea shall be ours clear, which "now the enemies keep, and also we shall beliege the Cattle round, as well by Sea as by Land: "nay, more than that, within short time we shall either enter it, being abandoned of the ene-E's mies, or else be masters both of it and them together.

These words not only put them in good hope, that the enterprise would be effected, but also fet them in a wonderful good conceit and admiration of the Captain himself. Then out of hand, all the wains and carts were taken up from all places as many as could be had, and were put rogether, and coupled one to another. Divers cranes and other instruments were setted for to draw up the ships to Land the way made plain and level, that the carts might go more easily, and pass away with lefs trouble and more expedition. After this they got together daught oxen cart jades and other labouring beasts, yea, and men also for to draw; and thus the work was lustily begun, insomuch, as within sew dayes, the sheet well rigged, appointed, and dressed, was brought about the Castle, and rid at anchor even in the avenue & entry of the haven. In these terms shood Tarent, Fram, when Annibal left it, and returned back to his wintering harbours. But authors write diversly of this revolt of Tarentum, whether it happed the year past, or at this present. But the greater number of them; and those that lived neerer to that time, when the remembrance of these matters was fresh, affirm that it was this very year.

there matters was frelh, aftern that it was this very year.

At Rome, the Confuls and Pretors both remained filli, until the *fifth day before the Calends of May, by occasion of the Latin holy-dayes, upon which day, when they had performed a solemn facifice, with all complements thereto belonging, on the Albain Filli, they departed every one to his several charge and Province. After this, there crept into the minds of men a new scrupulosity of conscience upon certain prophetical verses of one Martius, a noble and famous Prophet in times past. Now, by reason that in the year before, there was diligent serch and inquisition made, G for such books of Fortune, according to a decree granted out of the Senat, those verses came to hight, and to the hands of M. Empirius Pretto of the City, who sat upon that commission. And he immediately gave them to Sulla the new Pretor. Of two Prophesies of Martius, the one, which afterwards carried the greater authority with it, by reason of the event that happed so right, and declared it so evidently, caused the other also, whereof the time was not yet comes, to be of credit and believed. The sormer contained a Prediction of the overthrow at Cannae, in these

or fuch like words:

From Trojane line, O Romane once descended, Flie Canna River neer to Canna Town : Left frangers born, who have thy death intended. Force thee to fight on Diomede his down. But warning mine, thou wilt not rest upon, Until with bloud thou first do fill the plain; And then to Sea from fruitful Land, anon The men hall down the stream by thou fands Rain. Thy flesh must bait the fish in Ocean deep, And lure the foules that flie from high to prev, And feed wildbeafts, on earth below that keep. Mark well my words. Tove thus me taught to fay.

* The fame that Aufidus.

And they who had been fouldiers, and ferved in those wars, knew as persectly Diomedes his plains, and the River * Canna, as they did the very defeat it felf, and loffe at Canna. Then was the other Prophely likewise read, which was the darker of the twain: not only because suure things are more uncertain, than those which are past already; but also by reason of the kind of writing, which was more obscure and intricate, in these terms:

* Apollo is called in Homer Ilia. a. Ekebalos. i. shooting afar off,

If enemies ye would expel, if botch and plaquie fore Sent from a far, ve would drive forth, and vexed be no more; To Phobus (Romans) I advise, ye vow, from year to year To fet forth playes in folemn wife, wish mirth and merry chear, From publick flock, the people must, part of the charge disburse: The rest shall ve, for you and yours, defray with privat purse. The loveraign Pretor must procure these games to be performed, Who fits in place, mens pleas to hear, and fee all wrongs reform d. Then (hall the ten Decemvirs hight, the Greekish rites observe, In flaging beafts for sacrifice, and nothing from them swerve. If all be done accordingly, your joy (hall aye increase, Your State shall daily grow in wealth, and fruits of ble fed peace. For God Apollo will you fave, be will your fees destroy, Who at their pleasure wast your fields, and work you much annoy.

For the explanation and expiation both, of this prophetie, they rook one whole day. And the morrow after, there passed a decree from the Senate, That the Decemvirs should peruse and look into the books of Sibrlla, about the exhibiting of those faid games, in the honour of Apollo, and celebrating likewife of the facrifices. And when all was peruled, and relation made before the Senat : the Lords made an Act, and fet down an order ; First, to vow and set forth solemn pa-* 37 lib. 10.fp. allow the Pretor* twelvethouland Afles, toward the expenses of the divine service, and two greater healts for facility. There profiled allogators here. stimes accordingly, to the honour of Apollo. Item, After the Games were done and finished to greater beafts for facrifice. There passed also another Act of the Senat, That the Decemvirs should celebrate divine service, and sacrifice after the observance and rites of the Grecians; and offerupon the Altar these beasts, to wit, an Ox with guilded horns, and two white femal Goats, with guilded horns likewife, for Don Apollo : and a Cow with horns, in like manner guilded, for Dame Latina The Pretor, when he was to represent the Games within the Circus Maximus, gave commandment, and made proclamation, That the people, during the time of those solemnities, should contribute money, for an offering to Apollo, every man according to his ability, and as he N might well spare. This is the beginning of the Apollinare Games and Playes exhibited for to obtein victory, and not for to escape some plague or pestilence, as most men suppose. And when they were celebrated, the people flood to behold and look on, adorned with garlands upon their heads, and the dames and matrons of the City went in procession, and made supplications, Every mans doore was fet open, and they feafted and made good chear generally through the City in the open freet; and a high holyday this was, folemniled with all kind of ceremonies that could be devised.

But to return again to Annibal, who was about Tarentum; and both Consuls remaining in Samnium, but ready, as it feemed, to befiege Capua: it fell out, that the Campans already were distressed with hunger and famine, (a calamity that usually followeth long and continual siege) and O the reason was, because the armies of the Romans had impeached and hindred their seednesse, Therefore they dispatched Embassadors to Annihal, befeeching him, that he would take order for grain to be brought into Capua, from all parts neer adjoyning, before that the Confuls were come abroad with their legions into their territory, and all the wayes belet, and passages stopped by the guards and companies of the enemies. Whereupon, Annibal gave direction to Hanno, that he should remove out of the country of the Brutii, and passe over with his forces into Campania, and endeavour so, that the Campans might be provided of sufficient store of corn. Then

A Hanno dislodged anon, and departed with all his power out of the * Brutians countrey, purposing * Abress to avoid the leaguer of his enemies, and namely the Confuls, who lay in Samniam: and when he approached neer to * Benevemum, he pitched his Tents three miles from the City it felf, upon a * somewhi, or high ground. After which, he commanded, that the corn should be brought to him into his toucoulin Cacamp, out of all the affociat and confederar Cities thereabout, into which it had been carried in lonia. the summer afore; and allowed a good guard for the safe convoythereof. After this, he sent a messenger to Capua, to give them notice, upon what day they should attend, and be in readinesse to receive their corn; and against the time, provide out of the countrey for the carriage, carts, wains, and draught-beafts, and pack-hories of all forts. But the Campans, like as they carried B themselves in all things else, idly and neg igently, so in this they were very slack and retchiess for they sent little above forty carres, and some few beatts for carriage besides. For which they had a check given them, and were rebuked by Hanno; because that hunger, which causeth the very dumb beaft to bestir it self and make hard shifts, was not able to prick them forward to be more careful about their own bufiness. So there was a farther day appointed for to fetch their corn, and to come more furnished and better provided for carriage. All this being reported to the men of Beneventum, with the circumflances and particulars, as it was, they addressed with all speed ten Embassadors to the Roman Consuls, encamped then about Bornaum. Upon which intelligence given of the affairs at Capa is they took order, and agreed between themselves, that one of them should conduct an army into Campania. And Falving, who undertook that charge, C marched by night to Beneventum, and pet himfelf within the walls of the Town. And there he was advertised by them that dwelt neer hand . That Hinna was gone out with part of his forces, for to purvey corn; that there were 2000 carts come, with a rude and diforderly multitude befides of people, without armor; that all that they did was in hurry, in half, and great fear; and finally, that the camp was out of form and fathion, and all good military order dean gone, by reason of a rabble & multitude of country clowns, come out of those quarters, and entermingled amongs them. The Consul, I say, being enformed for certain by credible persons of these things, gave his fouldiers warning to make ready against the next night ensuing, nothing but their enhens and weapons, for that they were to charge upon the camp of the Carthaginians. And fo they fet forward at the relief of the fourth watch, leaving their packs and truffes with all their bag D and baggage behind them at Beneventam: and prefenting themselves before the camp somewhat before day, they rut them into such a bodily fear, and so tertified them, that if it had been pitched upon a plain ground, no doubt, it had been won at the first assault. But the height of the place, and their rampiers and fortifications befides, which could not possibly beentered upon, without climing upon the steep hill with much difficulty, were a desence unto it. By day light there was a lufty affault given, and a hot skirmith begun, but the Carthaginians not only defended and kept their rampier, but also (as having the vantage of the ground) they chased and thrust the enemies back, as they mounted up the hill. Howbeir, resolute hardinesse overcame all hardness and difficulties whatfoever; For in diverse places at once they advanced as far as the banks and trenches; but it cost bloudy blows first, and the death of many a souldier. The Consul therefore E calling the Coronels and Marshals together, said, it were not amisse to give over that rash and heady attempt, and, as he thought, it were the fafer course, for that day to retire the army to Benevertum, and on the morrow to encamp themselves afront the enemy, to the end, that neither the Campans might get forth, nor Hanno return and enter into the Town again. And that this might be the sooner effected, and with a great deal more ease, he would send for his Colleague also with his army, and both of them jointly bend their forces that way. But these devices of the Captain general were foon dasht. For as he was about to found the retreat, the fouldiers with a loud voyce cried out, that they could not away with fuch faint Captains; they fcorned to be commanded in so cold and slothful service; they would none of that: and so put the Consul out of his bent. It happed, that next unto the gate entring into the enemies camp, there served pa cohort or company of the Peligni, led by Captain Vibius, who caught the banner out of the bearer his hand, and flung it over the rampier, and with that, fell to curing himself and his com-lailado into their camp. Now by this time the Peligni fought within the rampier: and then Valerius Flaceus a Coronel of the third legion, from another fidefell to upbraid the Romans, and hit them in the teeth with their beaftly cowardice, for inflering their allies to have the honor of entring and taking the camp. Whereupon T. Pedanius (a centurion of the Regiment called Principes, and serving in the first place thereof) took likewise an ensign from him that carried it, and withal, Now shall, quoth he, this ensign, and this Centinere (meaning himself) presently be G within the rampier of the enemies: let me see who dare follow, and save it from being taken by the enemy. At first, his own band and company followed him hard at heels, as he clambred to get over the rampier, and then the whole legion came after likewife. By this time, the Conful also feeing his fouldiers climbing over the rampier, changed his purpose, and was of a clean other mind: and from calling and reclaming his fouldiers back, fell to exhort and encourage them, shewing in how great hazard and danger a right hardy and valiant cohort of allies were, and the whole Legion of Citizens besides. They all therefore set to and every man did his best and notwithflanding there was many a dart driven and javelin lanced, notwithflanding the enemies op-

pany both, wishing a plague light upon him and them to, if the enemies went away with that banner: and therewith led himself the way, and brake first through the trench, and over the pal-

posed their armor and bodies full against them yet they never slinted to assay every place, as well H high as low, until they were broken through, and gotten in. Many a man was hurt (ye may be fure) but yet even they that bled until they fainted, and were not able to fight any longer, carried this mind and strove withal, to die yet within the rampier of their enemies. Thus in the turning of an hand the camp was won, as eafily as if it had been pitched upon a plainand even ground, and not fortified at all with trench and rampier. From this time now, there was no more fighting, but killing on all hands in that tumult and confusion of pell mell within the camp, Slain there were of enemies more than fix thousand, and above seven thousand taken prisoners, together with the Campan purveiors for corn, and all the provision of wains, carts, and labouring beafts. Besides another huge booty was taken, which Ha no when he went a foraging all abroad t had raifed out of the country of the affociats of the people of Rome. Then the Conful after he had cast down all the fortifications of the camp, returned from thence to Benevimum. And there both the Confuls together (for Ap. Claudius also thither came after a few dayes) made sale of all the prizes and pillage, and divided the same. Vibius the Pelignian, and T. Pedanius a principal centurion of the third legion, by whose forward and Engular good service, the camp of the enemies was forced, were rewarded especially above the rest. Hanno then together with some few forragers whom by chance he had with him returned from Cominium Ceritum (whither the news came of the losse of the camp) into the Bruttans country, more like one that fled in rout, then

The Campans also having heard, as well of their own losses as of their allies, sent Embassadors. unto Annibal, to certify him; "That both the Confuls were at Benevintum, that the war was " within a dayes journey of Capua, and but a step from the very gates and walls of the City: and "unless he made good hast to succour and ref. ne them, Capua would to oner come under the "obedience and fib jection of the enemies than Arps did. And he was not to make such a reck-"ning of all Tarentum (much less then of the Cattle aione) as in regard thereof to leave Capua un-"defended, and yeeld it to the people of Rome, Capital lay, which he was wont to compare and " make equal with the City of Rome. Annibal promised that he would take care for the good estate of the Campans: and for the present he sent two thousand Horsemen with the Embassa-dors, as a guard to keep the country and territory from invation and spoil.

The Romans in this mean time, among other their affairs, neglected not the fafety of the Castle of Tarentum, and the garrison there believed. For C. Servilius, Lieutenant, by order and authority of the Senat, was fent by P. Cornelius the Pretor into Hetroria, to purvey for com, and to buy flore: who with certain ships laden therewith, arrived in the haven of Tarentum, passing even through the guards of the enemies. At whole coming, they that before whiles they had but finall hope, were oftentimes by way of parly moved by the enemies to go to the contrary fide, now themselves began to perswade and sollicit the enemy to come unto them. And the garrison surely was strong enough, considering that the souldiers which lay at Metapontum, were drawn from thence to the defence and keeping of the Castle of Tarestim. And therefore the Metapontins, so foon as they were delivered of the fear whereby they were kept and held in as with a bit, revolted unto Annibal. Semblably did the Thurins also, who inhabited the same tract by the Sea side, M They were moved and periwaded thereto, not so much by the rebellion of the l'arentins and Metapontins, with whom they were linked in kindred, and joyned neer in bloud (over and befides that they were descended as well as they, out of Achaia) as with anger toward the Romans for the hostages lately by them killed. Their friends therefore and kinsfolk dispatched letters and messengers unto Hanno and Mago (who were in the country of the Brutii neer at hand) offering to deliver the City into their hands, if they brought their power and presented it before their walls. Now was there one M. Atinius, Captain there over a small garrison, whom they suppofed might be eafily drawn forth of the Town to make some rash and inconsiderat skirmish, presuming not so much upon his own souldiers (who were but an handful) as upon the youth and flour of the Thurians, whom he had of purpose enrolled into bands and companies, and furnished N with armor against the like occasions of service. The Carthaginian Captains afore named, had divided all their forces between them in two parts, and were entred into the territory of Thirli: and Hanno with his Regiment of footmen, advanced with banners disp ayed before the City: Mago with the Horsemen, staid behind close among the Hills, over-against the Town, and there lay fecretly in ambush. Atinius then, who by his espials was enformed only of the squadrons of footmen, came forth with his forces into the field, ignorant (God wor) both of the fallhood and treason of the Townsmen, and also of the covert trains and ambushment of the enemies. The skirmish of sootmen was exceeding faint and cold, whiles the Romans being but few, sought in the vanguard: and the Thurins looked rather when the skirmish should end, than made any hast to fight themselves and help: and withal, the squadrons of the Carthaginians gave ground for O the nonce, to train the enemy as far as the fide of the Hill, under which, on the other fide their Hor'emen lay in wait and were ambushed. And thither they were not so soon come, but the Horsemen made hast to shew themselves, with a great outcry, and presently put to slight the raw and disordered company and multitude of the Thurins; who were not very fast and sound in heart to them on whole fide they fought. The Romans albeit they were environed round, whiles the footmen lay fill at them on the one fide, and the Horsemen charged them a-fresh on the other fide, yet they mainteined fight, and held out a long while: but at last, they likewise turned their

A back and fled to the City. There the traitors and confpirators being gathered together on heaps, so soon as they had let in at the gates standing wide open, the companies of their own citizens: when they faw once the Romans running apace in difaray roward the City, made a talfe alarm, cruing aloud that the Carthaginians were at hand, and that both enemies and friends together intermingled, would enter the City, unless they made better halt to shut the gates. So they excluded the Romans out, and gave them as a prey to be hewn in peeces by their enemies. Howbeit, Atinius with some few, was received within the Town first, After this, there was some mutiny and differtion between the citizens themselves, for a little while. Some were of mind to stand upon their guard and defend the Town: others were of opinion, to yeeld unto fortune of B the time, and deliver it up to the victors hands. But in conclusion, fortune and bad counsel together, (as for the most part it falleth out) prevailed. And so, after they had brought Atinius and his fouldiers to the haven fide, unto their ships for to be embarked, more upon good will that they bare to him for his mild and just government, and therefore were ready to fave him, than for any regard at all they had of the Romans, they received the Carthaginians into the

The Confuls then led the legions from Beneventum into the territory of Capua, not only to make spoil and marre the corn, that was laid up already in throng Towns against winter, but also to affail Capua: supposing they should make their Consulfhip renowned unto posterity, by the defirmation offorich and wealthy a City: and belides, do away that great dishonour and shameful c blemish of the Empire of Rome, in suffering a City so neer unto them to continue now three years in rebellion, without revenge and condign punishment. But to the end that Beneventum should not be without a guard, and that against all suddain accidents and occurrences of war, in case Annila! should come to Capua, for to rescue and aid his allies, (which they made no doubt but he would do) there might be Horsemen to withstand his violence: they commanded T. Gracchus to come out of Lucania, with the cavalry and light armed tootmen: and to take order and leave some other to govern the legions and the standing camp, for the guard and defence of thole

Gracehus before he dislodged out of the Lucans country, hapned to have a fearful and prodigious token, as he offred facrifice. For after the facrifice was performed and accomplished, two D Snakes came gliding out of a blind hole, no man knew how, to the entrails of the beaft, and fell to eat the Liver: and so soon as they were espied, suddainly glid out of fight and were no more ieen. Now, when as the bowel-pryers had given advice to kill a new facrifice, and to foon as the inwards were opened and laid foorth, to tend and look unto them more heedfully; the Snakes came again, as it is reported the second and third time: and when they had once given as it were an affay, and tafted the Liver, they went cleer away without hurt and untouched. And albeit the Soothfayers aforefaid, had given an Item, and foretold, that this prodigious fight perteined properly unto the chief Captain and General, and warned him to take heed of some close persons and secret practises: yet his fatal destiny of death that hung over his head, could by no forecast and providence be altered and avoided. Now there was one Flavius a Lucane, the principal head of E that bend and fide of the Lucans, which when the other faction revolted unto Annibal, took the Romans part; and having been by them chosen the Prator had continued in that place of Magifiracy a year already: this man all on a fuddain chanced his mind and affection, and feeking to wind and enter into the favour of Annibal, could not be content to revolt himfelf, and to draw with him the Lucans to rebellion; unless he made a league also and covenant with the enemies. and fealed it with the murder and bloud of his General : of him (I fay) who being enterteined and lodged in his house, he purposed villanously to betray. He entred therefore into secret speech and conference with M.190, Governour over the Brutii, and having capitulated with him, under his faithful word and promite, That if he delivered the Roman General into his hands, the Lucans might live in freedom under their own Laws, in league and amity with the Carthaginians; F he told him of a place into which he would bring Gracehus, with a small company and guard about him : willing Mago to put his foot and horie in arms, and in such a place aforehand wherein he might bellow closely and secretly a mighty number of men. When the place was well viewed and confidered all about, they agreed upon a day, for putting this plot in practife. This done, Flavius cometh to the Roman General Gracehar, and enformeth him that he had begun an enfetprife of great confequence, for the accomplishment and full perfecting whereof, he needed the helping hand of Gracehus himself; "Namely, he had periwaded with all the Prators and Go-"vernors, who in that universal and general trouble of all Italy, had revolted unto Annibal, for "to return again into the league and friendship of the Romans leeing that the Roman state and "their Dominion, which by the overthrow at Canna was come in a manner to the lowest ebb, G "and fall into extream delpair, flowed now again, and grew every day more than other, greater " and mightier; whereas contrary wife, the pullfance of Annibal decayed much, and was well-"neer come to nothing: belides, the Romans were menthat might be appealed and reconciled "neer come to nothing: ochues, the roundars were unatable to for never was there nation un-

I have therefore (faith he) appointed a convenient place of enterview and conference: lying out of the way and forth of light, but yet not far from the Romans camp. There the matter may be dispatched in few words, and all the name and nation of the Lucans, er reduced under the obedience and alliance of the people of Rome. Gracehus tufpecting no fraud nor harm neither in his words nor deeds, founding all to a great likelihood of Emplicity and truth in his conceit, departed out of the camp attended upon with his Sergeants, and guarded only with a corner of Horsemen: and so by the guidance of his own host, in whose house he lodged, was plunged headlong within the danger of the ambush of his enemies; Who suddainly arose; and Flaving because he would put it out of doubt that he was a traitor, went to their side and joyned with them. Then they let flie arrows, and shot darts against Gracehus and his Horsemen on every fide. "Whereupon Gracehus alight from horleback, and commanded the rest to do the " fame, exhorting them, that the only thing which fortune now had left unto them, they would er grace and honour with vertue. With these words, he wrapped his rich coat of arms about his left arme (for they had not

enemies. The fight was far greater on their part than for the proportion and number of the men. The bodies of the Romans lay open most unto the shot. And thus overcharged on all sides from the higher places: as being in the valley subject to the volley of their darts, they were soon pier-1 ced through. When Gracehus was left naked alone, and his guard dead at his feet, the Canhaginians did what they could to toke him alive: but he having espied among the enemies his good hoft and friend, that Lucan, ran among the thickett presse: where he was so fully bent to michier him, that they could not will nor choose but kill him outright, without they would have lost the lives of many other. He was not fo foon dead, but Mago fent him fireight wayes unto Annibal, and commanded that his body together with the knitches of rods (belonging to his Magifiracy), should be presented and shewed before the Tribunal seat of the General. And this is the true report of the end of Gracehus: to wit, that he let his life in the Lucan Land, about the plains which are called Veteres Campi. There be some that tell it otherwise, how he being accompanied with his Serieants, and three ferving men his bondflaves, went out from the camp within the M territory of Beneventum, neer unto the River * Calor, forto wash himself : where there chanced his enemies to lurk, and lye in wait among the willows and falows that grew by the bank fide, and to being unarmed and naked too, he was affaulted, where he defended himself as well as he could, with flinging at them pible stones such as the River afforded and carried down with the Afream, and so was flain. Others write, that by advice of the Bowel-pryers, he went out of the camp half a mile off, for to purge and explate in some pure and clean place, those prodigious tokens above rehearfed: and there was befet and environed round about with two troops of Numidian Horsemen, who happed there to lie in ambush. See how variable and uncertain the same goeth, both in what place, and after what manner, this so noble and samous person cameby his death. Nay, the very funeral and sepulture also of Gracchus, is diversly delivered. Some say, he was N enterred by his own fouldiers within the Roman camp. Others give out and fay (and that is the more common report) that by the appointment of Annibal he was butied in the very entrance of the Carthaginian leaguer; that there was a funeral fire made in solemn wise to burn his corps; that the whole army justed and ran at tilt and tornment in their compleat armor; that the Spaniards leaped and danced Morrice; and each nation according to their guile and manner performed fundry motions and exercises as well of their weapons, as of their bodies : yea, and that Annibal himself in proper person, with all honor of funeral pomp that might be devised, both in word and deed, folemnized the obsequies in the best maner. This say they that affirm the thing to have hapned in the Lucans country. But if a man should believe them, who record how he was flain at the River Calor, then the enemies gat nothing of him but only his head, Which being O presented unto Annibal, he sent Carthalo immediatly with it into the Roman camp, unto Ca. Carnelius the Treasurer or Quellor: who there within the very camp performed the funerals of the General, and both army and citizens of Beneventum together folempized the same right ho-

The Confuls being entred into the territory of Campan, as they forraged all abroad, firseling one from another, were by the Townsmen of Canya which sallied out, and by the Horseman of Mago, put in lear; whereupon in great fright and haft, they rallied the fouldiers to their colours, a that were ranged over the Country : but before they could well embattail them, and let them in array, they were discomfited, and lost above a thousand and five hundred men. Upon which good fuccess, the enemies (as they are a nation by nature proud) began to be very lufty and exceeding audacious, infomuch, as they offered to skirmish fundry times with the Romans, and ever challenged them to fight. But that one battail, to unadvitedly and inconfiderately atchieved, made the Confuls more circumspect and wary afterward. Howbeit, one small occurrence hapned, which, as it encouraged and animated them again, so it abated the hearts, and daunted the boldness of the other. For in war there is nothing (be it never so little) but one time or other, it is the occasion of some great consequence and importance. There was in the camp one T. Quintius Crifpinus, linked in special friendship and familiarity with Eadins, a Citizen of Capud. Their acquaintance grew and encreased upon this occasion: This Badeus upon a time, before the revolt of Cupua, fell fick at Rome, and lying in Criffinus his house, was liberally and kindly used, yea, and tenderly seen unto by him, during his sickness. This Badius having put himself forward before the standing guards, that warded at the gate of the Roman camp, willed, that Cristinus should be called our unto him. Which being told unto Crispinus, he supposed no otherwise of it, but that he should talk friendly and familiarly with him. For albeit both nations generally were at enmity, in regard of the publick State, yet the private right and band of hospitality, remained still inforce, and was not forgotten, and therefore he went out somewhat apart from the rest of his fellows. Now, when they were come in fight and interview one of the other. I C challenge thee, O Criffine (quoth Badius) to combat: let us mount on Hor chack, and trye it out between us two, without any other companion, whether of us is the better man at arms. To this Crispinus made answer again and faid, We want no enemies, neither you nor I, upon whom we may make proof of our manhood : as for me, if I met and encountred you in the very battail, yet I would decline, avoid, and shift from you lest I should defile and stain my hand in the murder and bloudshed of my guest and friend. And with this he turned from him and went his way. But the Campane contrary-wife, upon these words, was the more eager with him, railing and rating at him for his effeminat cowardife and daftardiness, letting flie at the hatmless and innocent man, all spightful terms and reproachful language; which himself I wot (ithe had his due) . ~ was well worthy of: calling him a friendly foe, and a kind enemy indeed, and finally charged him, D that he made his excule of paring him, for triendship take, whom he knew he was not able to match in manhood and valour. But if (quoth he) thou thinkest, that by the breach of publick league and covenant, our private bands of amity and hospitality, are not yet enough broken in funder, then here I progounce openly, in the hearing of two armies, That 1 B.udins a Campane, renounce all hospitality with thee T.Q.uintus Grifpins a Roman, and so farewel all friendship for ever: I will, I say, have no more to do by way of acquaintance with thee, no fociety, no alliance, no hospitality will the guest have with that host, who in hostile manner is come to invade his native country, and to make affault upon the publick buildings and private houses thereof. And therefore, if thou be a man, meet me in the field. Crispinus drew back a long time, and was loth to enter into the action, but at last his fellow Horsemen, serving in the same troop and cornet with E him, forced and periwaded him, not to suffer that bragging Campane, thus to insult over him without revenge. Whereupon he made no more ado, nor any longer delay, but whiles he went unto the L. Generals to know their pleasure, whether they would permit and licenie him, our of his order and rank, to fight with an enemy that challenged him, and gave him defiance. And having obtained leave, he buckled his armor about him, took his weapon, mounted on Horseback, and calling upon Badius by name, bad him come forth if he durft to firg'e fight. The Campane made no flay, and so with spear in rest, set spurs to, and they ran their Horses full carier one at the other. Criffinus with his lance pierced Badius above his shield, through the left shoulder, and therewith unhorsed him, and when he was faln to the earth with the push, he alight himself from his horse, minding on foot to fall upon him as he lay along, and so to dispatch him outpright. But Bading, before his enemy feiled upon him, left his targuet behind and his horse, and by blondy point of his lance, was with much praise and great gratulation of the souldiers, brought homourably to the Confuls, and presented before them. At whose hands he was both highly commended, and also liberally rewarded. Annibal having dislodged out of the territory of Beneventum, and removed into Capua, within three dayes after he was come thither, brought forth his forces into the field, making no doubt at all, but that; confidering the Campans in his absence, had but lew dayes before fought fortunally, the Romans now would be so much lesse able to abide his royal army so often used G to victory. And verily when the conflict was once begun, the Roman battailons of the Infantry were much troubled and diftreffed, especially with the fierce assault of the Horsemen, who overcharged and pelted them mightily with their darts and Javelins, until the fignal was given to their own Cavalry also, to fee hard to, and charge the enemies with their horse. Now good footmanship recovered his own fellows. Crispinus then, all goodly to be seen with the spoils of his enemy, made she w of the horse and armor that he had won, and bearing up withal the whilesthe men of arms were buly in fight on both fides, it hapned that the Regiment of Sempronius Gracebus lately flain were describe marching affar off under the conduct of Co. Cornelius the Treatures, which put both parts inlike fear, left they were some new and fresh enemies that advanced against them. So they founded the retreat on either fide, as if they had been agreed fo to do denarted out of the field (as a man would fay) on even hand, and settred themselves unto H their feveral holds: howbeit, the greater number was flain of Romans, upon the first violent charge given by the Horsemen. From thence, the Confuls intending to draw Annibal away from Capia, departed fundry wayes, Fulvius into the territory of Cumes, and Claudius into the Lucans Country. The next day, when Annibal was advertifed, that the Romans had abandoned their camp, and that they were gone into divers parts with their feveral armies, being at first uncertain whom to purfue, reloived at length to make after Appins, and so began to do. But after he had once trained the enemy about to the place that he defired, he returned himfelf another way to Capra. And Annibal hapned also upon a new occasion presented to have a good hand of his ene-

There was one M. Centenius, furnamed Penula, one of the chief Centurions of the Pilani, a fingular good Captain in that kind, as well in regard of his mighty and goodly body, as also of his brave mind, and valiant courage. This man having served out his ordinary time required by Law, was by the means of P. Cornelius Sullathe Pretor, brought into the Senat-house, and became a Petitioner unto the LL, of the Councel, that he might have the leading of five thousand footmen: promising that within short time, by reason he was so well acquainted with the nature and qualities of the enemy, and withal fo much beaten in coasting those quarters, he would do fome great deed, and atchieve a piece of notable service: and look, by what cunning devices and stratagems, both our leaders and our armies had been until that day, entrapped and over-raught. the very fame would be use and practise against the enemy. He was not so vain and unadvised in k making this offer, but they were as tottish and foolish again in taking him at his word, and trusting him: as who would fay, A good Leader and Commander, and a front and hardy souldier were all one. And so where as he demanded but five thousand, he had the charge given of eight thousand: whereof the one half were citizens, the other allies and confederats: and besides them, he himself also gathered together out of the country as he marched, a good Company of Voluntaries: info much as his power was doubled, by that time he came into the Lucans Country, where Annibal abode, after that he had followed Claudius in vain, and to no effect. But 2 man that had but half an eye, might fee what the fequel and event would be of the conflict between General Annib. 1, and Continere Centenius: between both armies also, the one of old beaten fouldiers nied ever to victories, the other of raw novices and yong beginners, yea, many I of them taken up fuddainly in halt, and flenderly armed by the halfs. For fo foon as both hoffs had confronted one another, and that on neither fide they dallied and shifted off, but minded prejently to go to it & fight; foon were they on both parts arranged in order of bartail. And albeit the Romans had many disadvantages, yet they mainteined skirmish more than two hours and that io horly and couragiously that they shrunk not one jot, so long as their leader stood on foor, But after that he once was firucken down and flain, who not only in regard and remembrance of the former pame (that he had won) of valour and prowefs: but also for fear of future shame and dishonor, in case he should remain alive after the defeat of his forces, whereof he was the only caple through his fool-hardy rathnels, presented himself desperately upon the pikes of his evemies, where he might be fure of nothing but prefent death : and incontinently the Roman bat-M tailon was discomfitted and putto flight. And so hard bestead they were, in seeking wayes and means to escape (all the avenues were so laid and beset with the Horsemen) that of so agreat a multitude, there were hardly one thouland laved, all the rest miscarried here and there, and came by their death one way or other.

In this mean time, Capua was fireightly beleaguered by the Confuls, and they began to affault it in most forcible manner: great preparation there was of all things needful unto such an exploit, and with great diligence every thing provided and brought accordingly. Com was conveighed to Callinum, and laid up there for store: at the mouth of the River Vulturnus (where now the City flandeth) was the sconce and castle fortified (which Fabius before had built) aad a strong garrifon therein planted, to the end that both the Sea fo neer, and the whole River also might be N at their command. Into these two fortresses standing on the Sea side, as well the corn which lately was fent out of Sardinia, as also that which Mutius the Pretor had bought out of Metraria, was transported from the Port of Oftia, whereby the army might be fetred plentifully all winter feafon. Over and besides that losse received in the Lucans country, the army likewise of the losses lones, i. Voluntary fouldiers (which during the life of Craffus, had ferved truly and faithfully) now a handoned their colours; as if by the death of their Captain they had taken themselves fully discharged from warfare.

Annibal made no small account of Capua : for willing enough he was that his allies and friends there should not be forfaken and left in fo great peril wherein they flood ; and yet upon that fortunat fuccels which hapned unto him through the rathbels of one Roman Captain, his fingers O itched to be doing with another of them, and hoped to find fome good opportunity and advantage no furprise and overthrow both Captain and army. Whereas therefore certain Apulian Embaffadors advertised him, that Co. Fulvius the Pretor, (who are the first in affaulting of certain Cities in Apalia, which had revolved unto Annibal, bare himself like a wife and prodent Captain: now afterwards, upon his good for tune and happy specifin the feathairs, whereby himself and his souldiers, had made up their mouths and filled their hands well wish booties and pillage) both hinglest and his men were grown to idle and to diffoline, that ne good government normilitary

a discipline remained among them: hereupon Annibal having good experience, (as often heretofore. fo in this late instance but few dayes past) in how that stead an army ferveth, when it is directed by an unskillul Leader removed histories into Apulia, Now lay the Roman legions and Fulving the Pretor, encamped about Heragnia. And when the news came thither that the enemies were on their journey coming toward them, hardly might the fouldiers be reclaimed and stayed, but they would in all hast pinck upstandard and enigns, and traight wayes go into the field and bid them battail, without commission and commandement of their Pretour. And no one thing more held them back, than the affured hope they nad to do it at their pleasure whenfoever they would. Annibalthe night following, having certain intelligence, that there was a tumult in the camp, and that most of the foundiers mightily importuned their General to put forth unto them the figual of battail, and called earneftly unto him for to lead them out into the field, madefull account to meet with good opportunity and occasion, to have a fair day of hisenemies : and therefore he bestowed three thousand men lightly appointed, in divers villages thereabout, among the thick groves and bushes, and within the woods : who at a sign given them, should all at once upon a suddain, start up and leap forth of their lurking corners; and withal, he gave order to Mago, with two thousand Horsemen or thereabout to keep all the wayes whereas he supposed they were most like to see and make escape. Having thus ordered all things beforehand in the night time: at the break of day he entred the field with his army, and embattailed himself in warlike manner. Futvius for his part, was not behind; not induced so much upon any c hope or conteir he had of good (peed as drawn and haled thereto through the rash enforcement and compulsion of his souldiers. And therefore as they came forth to battail upon a head and heat, inconsideratly so they were set in array as disorderly; even at the pleasure of the souldiers, according as they came forth and took up their ranks and files, as they lift themselves: and then again as the toy took them in the head left the same, either upon wilfulness or fear. The first legion together with the left wing or cornet of Horiemen were first marshalled : and the squadrons drawn and firetched out in a great length: not withflanding the Knight-Marshals and Coronels cried out, that within, there was no itrength nor power at all ; and that the enemies wherefoever they should hap to charge would break in upon them and go through. But no wholesome counsel for their owngood might be taken and considered upon: nay they would not so much as blend their ear, and give them the hearing. And by this time Annibal was in place, with another manner of army (you may be jure) and otherwise ordered and aranged. And therefore the Romans were not able to abide so much as the first shout and shock of the onset. The Captain himfeil (as foolish and heady as Centenius, but in courage and resolution far short of him) seeing how the world went the field like to be loft, his fouldiers in fear and great perplexity; recovered his here in great hast, and with some two hundred horsemen sled away and estaped: all the army besides, beaten back affront, beset behind flanked on the sides, and environed round, were so killed and hewn in pieces, that of eighteen thouland, there were not past two thousand saved. And the enemies besides were masters of the camp.

When these losses one in the neck of another were reported at Rome, the City was set in a great fit of forrow and fear for the while: but fo long as the Confuls, in whom refled the main chance, E had hitherto prospered and sped well, they were the lesse troubled at these by blowes and cross m'sfortunes, Whereupon they addressed C. Lectorius and M. Mitilius as messengers unto the Confuls, willing them to gather together with good care and diligence, those dispersed reliques and remainders of the two armies; also to have an eye and heedful regard unto them, that upon fear and desperation they weelded not themselves to the enemy (as it happed after the Camilan overthrow;) and last of all, to make diligent search and seek out those Volones, or voluntary servitors, that had abandoned their enfigns and caffed themselves. The like charge was laid upon P. Corpelius, who had commission besides to levy moremen. And he made proclamation throughout all market Towns fairs and places offrequent refort, That those Volones should be found out and brought againto their own colours, to serve as aforetime. All these directions were executed and accomplished with exceeding great care and diligence.

Appius (Li dius the Consul, after he had made D, Junius Captain of the iconce erected upon the mouth of the River Pulsurnus, and M. Aurelius Corea Governour of Pricoli, with commisfrom That as any ships [with corn] from out of Hetruria of Sardinia arrived there, they should immediatly fend the corn to the camp; went back himself to Capua: where he found Q. Fulwins his Colleague, transporting thither all provision from Casslinum, and making preparation for the affaur of Capua. Thenboth Coff, jointly together befieged the City: and fent unto Cl udent Nora the Pretor, for to come unto them from Sueffula, out of the old camp of Claudius. Who akewile leaving a small ga riton there to defend the peece, with all his power and forces, G defended into the plains before Copus. So there were three royal pavillions pitched for three LL. Seperals abont Capua: and three full armies in three fundry places began to fortifie, erecting haffi one and fores in places mot far distant : yea, and to cast attench and raise a rampier round about the City And in divers quarters at one e, they skirmiffied with the men of Cap a, whenfoever they came to hinder their fortifications, with fo good fuccess, that the Townsmen were driven at last to keep within their gates and walls. But before that those rampiers and trenches abovefaid were fully finished and all ends brought together, there were Embassadors dispatched unto Annibal, to complain in the name of the Capuans, as finding themselves grieved, that he had forfaken Capua, and in a manner delivered it into the Romans hands and withall to befeech him earnestly that now or never be would rescue and fuccor them, being not only befieged, but also that up and almost trenched about, as within a prilon. P. Cornelius likewisethe Pretor of the City of Rome, fent his letters unto the Confuls, advising them before they had fully invested Capua round about, to make offer unto the Capuans of this liberty, That as many as would, might depart with bag and baggage out of Capua: and wholoever went forth before the *15.0f March * Ides of March, should enjoy their freedome and all their goods and lands: but as many as after that day, either departed or tarried there ftill behind, should be reckoned no better than very enemies. These incimations were made known unto the Campans, but so light they set by them, that they fell a railing, reviling, and menacing the Romans, with most reproachful taunts and spightful terms. Annibal was departed from Herdonia with his legions unto Tarentum, hoping either by I force or fraud to gain the Castle. And seeing he little prevailed, he turned from thence, and took his way to Brundusum, supposing that Town would be betrayed into his hands. Whiles he lay there also and lost his time in doing nothing the Embassadors of the Campans arrived and came unto him, with complaints and humble requests both at once. Unto whom Annibal made this glorious and lordlike answer with a Majesty: Once already have I raised the siege and never will the Confuls, I trow, abide my fecond coming. The Embaffadors having received their dispatch, departed with this hope: but much ado they had, to put themselves within Capua, so enclosed round was it (by this time) with a double trench and a rampier. It fortuned at the very same instant, when Capua was thus streightly beleaguer'd, that the siege also and affault of Syracuse came to an end: helped forward and hattned by intestine treathery k and treason withal, as well as by force of army and valour of Captain abroad. For Marcellus in the beginning of the spring, doubtful in himself and hanging in suspence, whether to bend his whole forces toward Agrigentum, against Himileo and Hippoer ates, or fill proceed to befiege Syraense: albeit he saw the City might not possibly be won either by forcible assault, (considering it was by fituation both by Sea and Land invincible) or pining famine, by reason the passage in manner lay open to and fro between it and Carthage, for fale transporting of all fort of victuals: ver because he would leave no stone unrolled, but try all wayes that could be devised; he commanded certain revolts from the Syracufians (for there fided with the Romans some of the nobleft persons of the City, who at the time of the first backsliding from the Romans, because they missisked and abhorted all rebellion and change in the state, were driven out and banished the I. City) to deal with their bend and faction by way of conference, to found the hearts (I fay) of fuch as were their followers, and to follicit them to their part: and withal to affure them (upon their warrant) that if by their means Syracuse were betrayed, they should live in freedome, and enjoy their own Laws as they would themselves. But no opportunity could they espie for to parly and talk with them. For by reason that these were many suspected to entline and draw that way, every man had a careful eye and regard unto them, that there could be no treachery practifed, but foon it would be found out and detected. Yet a bond-fervant toward one of the banished persons abovesaid, hapned to be let into the City, pretending that he was run away from the adverse part unto them: who happing to meet with some few, began to move and broach such a matter. After which, certain others lying close hidden under the nets in a fisher boat, came about w by water to the camp of the Romans, and had conference and communication with those former jugitives and exiled men. And thus from time to time this was practifed in the same manner, by divers and fundry persons, until at length they were a crew of fourscore in all. Now when all things were concluded for the betraying of the City, neer upon the point of execution, it chanced that one Attalus (a falle brother among them, who took fauff that he was not specially trusted in the matter) disclosed the conspiracy unto Epicides, and appeached the parties: whereupon they were all put to extream torture, and suffered death every one. When this plot would speed no better, they conceived hope another way, by a new occasion and occurrence that presently offred it felf. There chanced one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, sent from Spracula, as a messenger to King Philip for to be taken prisoner by the Roman armado. Now, both Epicides was very defirous and N exceeding careful how to ransome him, and also Marcellus was not unwilling for his part to grant the same. For even then, the Romans began to affect the friendship of the Ætolians, with which Nation the Lacedemonians were confederat, and in league. So, when there should be commissionners and delegates fent on both fides, to parle and treat about his redemption the most indifferent place for them to meet in, was at the key or wharf of "Trogili, fast by a turret which they call" Galeagra, as being just in the midst between, and most convenient for both parties. It happed now, that as they had recourse oftentimes thicher about this business, one of the Romans well viewed the wall neer by he counted the stones, that appeared in the forefront of the wal and made estimate to himself of their quadrature and proportion; and withal, giving a guess as neer as he could of what height (by his reckoning) and measure, the wall might be : and supposing it was a O good deal lower than either he himself or others, had alwayes before taken it to be, and easy to be scaled with ledders, even of a mean fize and middle fort, he relateth the matter, and his conceit of it to Marcellus. And in his opinion it was a thing not to be neglected, but to be thought upon. Burfor asmuch as there was no access unto that place by reason, that for the lowness therofit was the more carefully guarded and defended, it was thought good to wait for some opportunity and advantage to help that difficulty. Which, as good hap was offered in felf presently unto them by ▲ means of a fugitive: who gave them intelligence, that they held a folemn feast of Diana at that time within the City, and the same continued three dayes together: also he said that for want of other things, during this fiege to make good chear withal, they spared for no wine, but made merry therewith in great plenty and abundance. For why? not only Epicides had bountifully best owed wine upon the whole Commons, but also the great men of the City had in every ward and parish where they dwelt, allowed a proportion befides, of their own charges. When Marcellus heard this, he called unto him some few of his Colonels and knight Marshals, and conferred with them: and when they had forted out certain choice and elect Centurions and fouldiers, fit and sufficient men to adventure and execute so great a peece of service, and withal provided ladders B secretly : to all the rest he commanded a watchword and warning to be given, That they should betimes take their resection of meat and repose of sleep, for that in the night they were to be employed in an expedition and action of service. After this, when he thought it was about the time, that they (as having feasted all day long, and well filled their bellies with meat, and their heads with wine) were gone to rest, and newly fallen sound affeep, he commanded one ensen or company of fouldiers, to cary ladders; and befides them, there were upon a thousand well armed and appointed, marching with filence and in thin ranks, brought thither to the place. When the formost without any stir or noise at all had scaled the top of the wall, others followed in their course. For the torward and resolute boldness of the former, was able to animate and encourage the rest, if they had been fals-hearted. By this time now, the thouland armed ioldiers had seized C that part, when the rest of the ladders were set to: and upon more ladders still they gat up to the wall in diverte places, upon afignal given them from the gate Hexapylos. Unto which places the Romans were now come, and found no tirring at all, but exceeding filence and defolation, for asmuch as a great fort of them had made good chearwithin the turrets, and either were fast asleep with drinking wine already, or elle were bibbing still, notwithstanding their eyes were heavy, and their hearts asleep. And yet, some tew of them they took in their beds, and killed. Neer unto Hexapylos there is a little wicket, which with great violence they began withal, to break it open. So as now, both from the wall (as was before appointed) they gave fignal by found of trumper : and also from all parts they went not to work any more by ftealth, but plainly and openly without diffimulation. For they were come already as far as Epipola, a place full of D watchmen and warders. And the enemies were to be terrified now and firucken into fear, and no longer to be dealt withal by craft and guile. And it fell out so indeed, that they were mightily scared. For they heard not so soon the founding of the trumpets, and the shouting and outcry of them that were possessed of the walls and one part of the City, but the warders, thinking all was gone, some ran along upon the wall, others leapt from the walls, or else were born down headlong, with the press of others that were affrighted. And yet many there were, who were not ware at all of this mifery and extremity, both because generally they were all dead asleep, and also by reason that the City was so wide and large, that a thing felt and seen in some remote parts, reached not freightwayes throughout, to all the reft. The gate Hexapylos was broken down somewhat before day, at which Marcellus with all his power entred the City. He wakened them all, and E fer them to their bufinels; he made them take weapon in hand, and to help (what they could) a City in a manner wholly surprised and taken. Epicides made hast from the Island (which they themselves call Nasos) with a company of souldiers about him, making sull account to drive them out again: as supposing that they were but some few, who through the negligence of the watchmen and warders were got over the wall: and ever as he met with any that were scared and in fear, he said unto them effloons, that they themselves made more ado, and every thing worse than there was cause, reporting all in greater measure and more searful manner than need was in very truth. But when he saw all places about * Epipola full of armed men, after some small volley of short, * Some make and little skirmish with the enemy, (whereby he provoked them, father than did any good else) is the fish part he turned back again with his companies, and retired into Acradina, not feating fo much the vio- of syracula. Flence and multitude of the enemies, as left fome intestine mischief by this occasion might arise, and that he should find in this tumult and hurliburly, the gates of Acradina, and the Island shut again't him. Marcellus being entred within the walls, took his prospect from the higher places, and when he beheld under his eyes the most goodly and beautiful City of all others in those dayes, (by report) he wept and shed tears abundantly, partly for joy that he had brought his purpose to good a pais, and partly in compation and remembrance of the ancient glory and renown of that City. He called to mind the navies of the Athenians by them funk and drowned: he thought upon the utter overthrow of two puissint armies, together with the loss of two most noble and famous Captains of theirs: moreover, there came into his memory fo many wars fought against the Carthaginians, with so great peril and hazard : so many and so mighty Tyrants and Kings that G raigned and kept their feat and royal court there and amongst the rest, he could not chuse but think of King Hiero, of fresh and samous memory, a Prince, who above all other gifts which his own vertue and fortune had graced and endued him withal, was recommended especially for his many favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome. When all these things presented themselves to his remembrance, with this cogitation befides, how all that beauty and glory within one hours space was ready to burn on a light fire, and to be consumed into ashes: before that he advanced his ensigns against Acradina, he sent before, those Syracusians who had conversed (as is aforefaid) amongst the guards and garrison of the Romans to perswade the enemies with mild and gentle speech, yet, to yeeld the City. It so sell out, that the most part of them that warded the gates the and walls both, of Acradina, were certain fugitive revolts fled from the Romans, who had no hope at all, upon any condition whatfoever to be pardoned. Their would infler none, either to approach the walls, or to parle and speak with any. And therefore Marcellus, after he saw that enterprise frustrate and disappointed, commanded to retire with the enigns unto Euryalm. This Euryalus is a little mount and fort, fituate in the utmost quarter of the City temote tar frem Sea. and commanding the high way that leadeth into the fields, and the middle parts and very heart of the whole Island; a place very commodious for the taking up and receipt of all victuals. The Captain of this hold was Philodemus an Argive, placed there by Epicides. Unto whom there was fent from Marcellus, Sofis, one of them that murdred the tyrant : and after long comment ation, I Sofis with crafty words abused by him, and colourably put off until another time, made relation unto Marcellus that Philodemus had taken a farther day of respite and deliberation, but he per off fill from day to day, trifling out the time of purpole, until Hippocrates and Himileo might come with their forces and legions, making no doubt, but if he might receive them into his fortrels, the whole army of the Romans being now enclosed within the walls, should be overthrown, and utterly defeated. Marcellus feeing that Euryalus was not delivered up. (and forced possibly it could not be) encamped himself between Neapolis and Tyche (so are two parts of the City named, and may for their bigness go well enough for two entire cities of themselves:) for fear, lest it he were once entred into the populous and most inhabited places of the City, his souldiers greedy of pillage, would not be kept together, but run loofely up and down to rifle. Thither came unto him from Tyche and Neapolis, Embassadors and Orators, with olive branches adorned with sacred veils and infules, humbly befeeching him to hold his hand from effution of bloud, and firing the City, Marcellus calling his Councel about these their petitions, rather than demands, after mature deliberation, by general confent of all, gave express and streight commandment to the souldiers, that no man should offer abuse or violence to the body of any free-born person whatsoever: as for all besides, his will and pleasure was it should be their booty. Now was the camp of Marcellus defended on both fides with houfing in flead of a wall, and he bestowed a good corps de guardat the gates thereof, lying open over against the streets: lest when the souldiers ran to and fro in the City, the camp in the mean while might be affailed. Then upon the found of Trumpet the fouldiers fell to their bufinels, ran into all parts, brake open dores, fet all on a fearful hurry, but spilled g no bloud: and they never gave over ranfacking and rifling, until they had cast out and carried away all the riches and goods, that had been a gathering a long time, during their wealthy and prosperous estate. Amid these stirs, Philodemus also seeing no hope of succours and rescue, after he had covenanted for his fecurity, to return fafe and without harm to Epicides, withdrew his garrison away with him out of the fort, and rendred it up to the Romans.

The five and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Now whiles every man was turned another way, and busied in that part of the City which was forced, Bomilear taking the advantage of one night, wherein the Roman fleet by reason of a violent tempest could not ride at anchor in the main Sea, gat forth of the haven of Syracuse with 35 thips, and having Sea room, hoifed up fails, and away he went with a mery gale of wind, leaving 4" behind for Epicides and the Syracufians: and after he had informed the Carthaginians in what M danger the flate of Syracuse stood, returned within few dayes with a fleet of a hundred fail, rewarded for his labor (as the report wenr) by Epicides, with many rich gifts, which the treasure of King Hieropaid for, Marcellus possessed now of the forcress Euryalus, and having planted therea garrison, was well rid of one care yet: for he doubted, lest if a new power of enemies had been received behind his back into that fort, they would greatly have annoyed his men, enclosed now as they were, and encumbred within the walls.

After this he besieged Acradina, and invested it round about, and fortified three several camps (in meet and convenient places) against it, hoping to shut them up into such streights, that they should be driven to extream scarcity and want of all things. Now when as for certain dayes, the guards of the one fide and the other had refled quiet, suddainly upon the arival of Hippocrates and N Himileo, they within began from all parts to set freshly upon the Romans. For, first Hippocrates (after he had encamped and well fortified himself fast by the great Key, and given a signal to them that kept Acradina) affaulted the old camp of the Romans, where Crispinus lay with his guard for the desence thereof: then Epicides also sallied forth, and brake upon the Corps de guard of Marcellus: and withal, the Carthaginian fleet approached close to the firand that lieth between the City and the Roman camp, to hinder that Criffinus might have no aid fent unto him from Marcellus. And yet for all this ado, the enemies made a greater stir and tumultuous alarm, than any skirmish to speak of: for Crispinus not only gave Hippocrates the repulse, and drave him from the defences of his own camp, but also followed him in chace, as he fled fearfully in hast away: and Marcellas forced Epicides to take the City again, and get it over his head. So as now they O feemed very sufficiently provided and appointed against all dangers from thence forth, of their fuddain fallies and irruptions.

Over and besides all these troubles, there hapned a common calamity unto both, the plague lence in syra and petitlence: in such manner, as it might soon have withdrawn the minds, as well of the one part as of the other, from thinking any more of war. For, besides that it sell out to be the Autumn or harvest season of the year, the place it self by nature unwholsome, stinking and corrupt (but much more without the City than within) the extream and intolerable heat of the

A weather mightily diffempered all their bodies generally, in the camps both the one and the other. At the first, by occasion of the distemperature of the season, and corruption of the place. they both fell fick and died: but afterward by vifiting and tending one another that were infected, the difeafe grew catching and contagious, and fo spred and increased more and more: in fuch manner, as either they that were faln fick perished for want of looking to and diligent attendance; or if any came about them, to keep them and minister unto them, they were infected and endangered also as deeply as the other: so as every day a man could go no where, but either ~ death, or cories carried forth to their graves, were presented to his eyes: night and day in all places there was nothing heard but weeping, wailing, and piteous lamentation. In the end their R hearts were to hardned and made lavage again, by continual utage to this mifery, that not only they gave over to weep over the dead, and to accompany them unto their sepulchies with due mourning and doleful plaints, but also to carry them forth and to inter them; to that the breathleffe bodies lay feattred all abroad on the ground in the fight of them, that looked every hour for the like miterable death themselves. The dead killed the sick : the sick insected the found. partly with fear, and partly with the corruption and pelisterous stench that came from their bodies. And because they would die rather upon the twords point, than of this maladie, some of them made offer to go alone among the armed guards of their very enemies, to be killed out of hand, and rid out of their mifery. Howbeit, the plague was hotter by far in the Carthaginian camp, than among the Romans, by reason of corrupt water, and much flaughter committed there, and io long fiege about Syracufe. For of the enemies army, the Sicilians at the first, so soon as they faw the fickness to spread commonly, and increase by reason of the corruption of the place. got themselves away, and stole every man home to the Cities neer adjoyning. But the Carthaginians were fain to flick by it fill, as having no place to retire themselves unto, and so, they together with their Generals themselves Hippocrates and Himileo, died all of them, and not one escaped. Marcellus when he saw this mortality grow thus hot, brought his people into the City, where the houses and shadowy places yeelded some good refreshing to the sick and weak bodies: how beit, many also of the Roman army went of it, and turned up their heels. Thus when the Land-fouldiers of the Carthaginians were all gone and confumed of the plague, the Sicilians who had erved under Hippocrates, withdrew themselves into certain Towns, which were not n great, yet fure and firong both by natural fituation, and also by firength of walls and other defences; the one of them three miles from Stracule, the other fifteen miles diffant from the haven mouth: and thither they conveighed from out of their own cities adjoying, all manner of vichals, and fent abroad for aids of men. In the mean while Bomilear fet fail once again with his fleet for Carthage, where he made relation of the state of their confederats in such terms, that still he fed them with some hope. That not only by their help they might be faved, but also that the Romans (notwithstanding they had in some fort forced and taken the City) might be surprised and taken there themselves and in conclusion perswaded and prevailed so with them, that they granted not only to send with him a great number of hulks and caricks, laden with store of all things, but also to sumish him with E more ships of war, to encrease his Armado. Whereupon he departed from Carthage with 1 20

Gallies, and 70 ships of burden, and had forewinds good enough to set him over into Sicily. But thole winds kept him from doubling the point of the Cape Pachynus. The fame and rumor first of Bomilear his coming, and then his delay above mens expectation, that checked it again, wrought diverfly in the minds of the Romans and Syracufians, ministring one while feer, another while joy unto them both. Whereupon Epicides fearing left if the same Easterly winds which then sheld, and were settled in that corner, should continue many dayes more, the Carthaginian navy would return again into Affrick, leaving the guard of Acradina to the Captains of the waged and mercenary fouldiers, failed to Bomilear, riding fill with his fleet in the rode that looketh toward Affrick, and feating a conflict at Ses, not fo much F because he was inseriour to the enemies either inforce or number of ships (for he had many more than the Rômans) but for that the winds stood more favourably to help the Roman Armado than his : howbeit, in the end he perswaded him to try the fortune of a battail at Sea. And Marcellus for his part, feeing both the Sicilian forces gather and affemble together from all parts of the Island, and understanding that the Carthaginian fleet was coming with great store of victuals: for fear left at any time whiles he was shut up within the enemies City, he should be assailed both by Sea and Land: albeit he was short of them in number of ships, yet determined to hinder Bomilear for arriving at Syracufe. Thus tid two armadaes of enemies aftronting one another, about the head of Pachynus, ready to joyn battail, so soon as the calmness of the weather would give them leave to advance into the main and open Sea. Therefore when the East wind began to lie, @ which for certain dayes had bluftred and raped, first Bomilear weighed anchor: and the vanguard of his Armado feemed to gather still into the deep, only because he might more easily gain the Cape and promontory aforefaid. But so soon as he saw the Romans ships make way toward him, (I wot not what fuddain accident it was that affrighted him) he fet up all his fails and fell off, into the main Sea: and after he had fent certain messengers to Heracles, willing them for to fet again their hulks home into Affrick, himself coasted all along Sicily, and shaped his course for Tarentum. Epicides dilappointed thus on a suddain, of so great hopes that he had, because he would not return again to the fiege of a City, whereof a great part was loft already, faileth to Agrigencum, there to abide and expect the event and small issue, rather than to stir himself and H trye any more, how to help them with any succour from thence.

Theie things being reported in the camp of the Sicilians, to wit, that Epicides had quit Stracufe; that the Carthaginians had abandoned the whole Iland of Sicily, and in manner yeelded it again into the hands of the Romans: after they had founded first their minds who were befieved. by talk and conference with them, they fent Embassadors unto Marcellus, to treat about conditions of furrendring the City. When they were grown in a manner to this point, without any fquaring or difference at all, That the Romans should have the figurery all and wholly which belonged unto the Kings: and that, all the relt the Sicilians should enjoy, with liberry and their own proper Laws; the Embassadors aforefaid called forth to a parley, those unto whom Epicides at his departure had committed the government of the affairs, and declared unto them, that as they were addressed Orators unto Marcellus, so they were from him sent unto the army of the Sicilians: that generally all, as well the befieged, as those who were without the danger of the fiege, should be comprized within the treaty, and abide one and the same fortune: and that neither the one fide nor the other should capital ate or enter into any covenant for themselves apart, without all the rest. Who being received and admitted, for to salute and speak unto their kinsfolk and friends, made them acquainted with the agreement and composition between Marcel-Lus and them : and so ester they had presented unto them some good hope of their safety, they perswaded with them so far forth, as to joyn with them, and all together, for to set upon and affault the bodies of the Captains deputed by Eiglie des, namely, Polycle us, Philifio, and one Epi-K cides surnamed Sydus. When they were once made away and killed, they called the multitude together unto a general affembly: where they complained greatly of their poverty, and penury of all things (for which they were wont to mormur ferretly among themselves:) " And albeit " ye are diffressed (say they) with so many mileries and calamities, yet are ye not to blame for-"tune therefore, to long as it was in your own power and choice, either to be delivered from "them, or to endure them longer. As for the Romans (laid they) it was not hatred, but meer "love and charity, that moved them to come against Syracule for to affault it. For when they "heard that the government of the state was usurped by Hippocrates and Epicides (the ministers "first belonging to Annibal, and after to Hieronymus) then they began to lay fiege unto it inten-"ding not the overthrow and defiruction of the City it felf, but to put down and depose the L " cruel tyrant that ruled the flate. Seeing then, that now Hippscrates is dead, Epicides excluded " from Sy acufe, his Deputies and Captains killed, and the Carthaginians driven out of all their " hold and possession of Sicily, both by Land and Sea, what reason have the Romans, iber to be "willing and well content, that Spracyfe should continue in Lifety now, as well as it Hieroshim-"felf were living, the only mainteiner and observant upholder of the Roman amity? And there-"fore, if ought but well should happen, either to the City, or to the Citizens, ye may thankyour ce felves, and none elfe, for letting flip opportunity now offered, of reconciliation and attone-"ment with the Romans. Never look to have the like occasion hereafter, to that, which atthis "instancis presented: if ye had the grace to see what a door is opened for you, to be delivered "from the yoke of most insolent and proud tyrants. This speech they gave lear unto wither M ceeding accord and general applaule. But before that any Embaffadous were nominated to be fent unto Marcellus, it was thought good that new Pretors should be created. Out of the number of which Pretors, there were Orators addressed unto Marcellar. And the principal man among them, spake in this wife. "Neither we Syracusians (quoth he) O Marcellus, at the firster-"wolfed from you Romans but Hieronymus impious and wicked Prince as he was a yet nothing " fo much hurtful to you as to us: nor afterwards, when peace was knit again upon the murder " of the sygant, was it any citizen of Syracufe, but Hippocrates and Epicides (the Kingsight 6 hands and ministers, who oppressed and kept us under, with fear of one side, and with deceiva-"be fleights on another fide) that made the brack, and were the troublers and diffurbers of this peace. Nor yet can any man come forth and tay truly, that ever we were at our own liberty, N "tand enterseined not peace and amity with you. And now also I assure you, so soon as by the "maffague of their, that held Syracufe in such oppression and bondage, we began again to be our " own menyand to have the law in our own hands; the first thing you see that we do, is this, to ce come and prefent out selves unto you, to deliver up our armor and weapons, to yeeld our bo-"dies, our City, the walls, and all the ftrength thereof, and to refuse no condition, that in that "peafe you Romans to impose upon us. As to your self, O noble Marcellus, the Godshave "given you the honour of conquelt, over the most noble and beautiful city of all other in Greece. E Behold, now, what memorable acts foever that we have at any time atchieved, eitherby Land "or Sea, all makes to the advancement of the glorious title and dignity of your triumph. See "you then, that another day it be not known by bare hear-fay and the trump of fame, how great O "and mighty a City you have won, but rather that it may fland fill and remain for all policity " for a mark and worthy spectacle to behold : to the end, that who soever hereafter, shall refort "thither by Land, who loever shall arrive there by Sea, it may present unto them both our Trote phees and worthy victories over the Athenians and Carrhaginians ; and also this of yours over "us the bravelt conquett of alkthe reft. See (I fay) that you leave for your house and family, the City of Spracuse wholesand found, to do homage and fealty ever hereafter, to the name and "Linage of the Marcelli, and to hold of themas of their foveraign ILL, in chief and in villenage.

A "That all the World may see, that the late remembrance of Hieronymus, beareth no greater flocke "with the Romans , that the ancient name of King Hiero , a noble Prince of famous memory. "Much longer was hea friend, than the other an enemy. His good deeds and many favours ye "have tasted and selt with great contentment: the folly and madness of Hieronymus, hurt none " of you, but wrought his own confusion and overthrow. There was nothing but they might "have obteined at the Romans hands: all was cleer there, and no danger from thence. But a-"mong their own selves they were at more war : there was the peril, there was all the mitchief. "For the Roman rebels, who were run from them, doubting that they should be delivered over "into their hands, and not comprised within the terms of the composition and protection, drave B "the auxiliaries al'o that were waged touldiers into the tame scruple and fear. They haltily there-" fore took arms, and first killed the Pretors: and afterwards, ran all about to massacre the Syra-" cusians. Look whom they hapned to meet, them they murdred in this furious fit of choler. "What loever came next to their hands, and lay hand lome for them, they rifled. And because " for footh, they would not be without their leaders, they created fix provoits or Captains, that "three should govern Acradina, and other three Nasos. At the last, after the uprore was "appealed, the mercenary fouldiers aforelaid, followed the matter throughly by learth and "diligent inquiry, what were the capitulations indeed agreed upon with the Romans; and "then began the very truth to appear, namely, that their condition and the fugicives were far These Embassadors in very good time returned from Marcellus, and certified them that they were caried away with a wrong furmife and falle inspition, and the Romans had no just cause to punish them. Now there was one of those three Provoits of Acredons, a Spaniard named Mericus. Unto him there was fent for the nonce among those of the retinne and train of the Embassadors aforesaid, one of the Spaniards, who were auxiliary fouldiers, ferving under the Romans: who finding Mericus alone without other company, gave him to understand especially above all "things, in what terms he had left Spain (and from thence he was newly come) namely, how the "Romans there were grown mighty, and held a great hand over them with their forces. And that himself, in case he had a mind to do some worthy deed, might soon rise, and be a great man "in his country: chuse whether he list to serve under the Romans, or return again into his own D "home. Contrary-wife, if he went on ttill in this course he had begun, and minded ftill to be "befieged, what long abiding place could be have there, that up as he was from bea and Land? Mericus pondered well their reasons: and when it was agreed, that there should be addressed new Embassadors unto Marcellus, sent his own brother with them, who by the self-same Spaniard was brought apart from all the rest unto Marcellas: and after he had a protestion granted, he laid the plot, and ordered all the matter how it should be done, and so returned to Acradina. Then Mericas because he would withdraw mens minds from all suspicion of treason, and that he intended nothing leffe, than to betray Acradina, gave it out, That he liked not, and would no more of this recourse, ever and anon, of Embassadors between; and therefore as he would admit of some to come from Marcellus, so he would fend no more to him. And to the end, that E all the guards should be kept more diligently, he thought it good to divide conveniently among the Provoits, the quarters of the City, and affigure every one his ward by himself, and that each one should be bound to answer for the safe keeping of his own division, and for no more. Then all gave their content to part accordingly, and to himself beselvhe charge of that quarter which reacheth from the fountain or well Arethufannito the mouth or entry of the great key or haven. And hereof he gave notice and intelligence to the Romans. Whenpon Marcellus cauled a great Hulk, laden with armed fouldiers, to be fatted by an haling rope unto a Gally of four course of oars, and so in the night by Arength of oars to be tewed and drawn up after it into Acreding, and landeth the foundiers over against the gate, that is neer to the foundain Arethula. This being done about the relief of the fourth watch, Merious received the fouldiers that were let afhore at F. the gate, according as before it was agreed. And Marcellus by the dawning of the day, with all his forces gave a Camilado apon the walls of Acradina, in fuch manner, that for only he turned thicher unto his affank all those that kept Jordina, but allo from Nafrithere came running whole iquadrons and companies of anned men (leaving their own wards) for to repel and put back the violence and effault of the Romans, In this turnoil and trouble, certein Barges appointed and furnished thereto aforehand, were brought about to Nulon & there fee other fouldiers aland: who coming at unwares upon the corpide to indethat were left half naked and very weak, by reason of the departure of their fellows, and finding the gates, wide open, at which erewhile the fouldiers ran out, with small ado were maftets of Notes, left, as it was, forforth of warders. who in feat made haft to run away and escape. And none of them als had leftermeans to de-G fend themselves, or smaller mind so tarry till, than the fightive rebels , for they dutt not well trust their own fellows, and then the housest of the skirmith made an escape. Marcellas to. fond as he understood, that Wafer was won, and likewife that one quarter of Ac adina was held and kept for bint; and that Maries with his guard had joyned to his foulders, founded the retreat: for fear, that the Kings treasure, which was more in name than in deed, should be rifled and spoiled

Thus by impressing the violence of the souldiers, both the rebel sugitives that were in Acradius, bad good time and place to shift for themselves and get away, and also the Sytacusians delivered now at last from fear, opened the gates of Acradina, and ient Orators unto Marcellus, H craving nothing but life for themselves and their children, Marcellus called his Councel together, and those Syracusans likewise, who in the time of civil dissention, were driven to forfake their houses, and remained among the garritons of the Romans: and then he made the Embassadors this answer. "There have not been (quoth he) more benefits and good turns for the space of " fifty years received at King Hiero his hands by the people of Rome, than detriments and mifchiefs intended against them within these few years, by them that have seized and possessed the "City of Syracula. But most of those mischiefs in the end, have lighted upon their heads right " justly, who duly deserved the same; and for the breach of league and covenants, they themselves "have suffered at their own hands more grievous punishment by far, than the people of Rome I "would willingly ever have required. As for me, this is the third year that I lie in nege before " Syracula; not, I affure you, with this intent, that the City should not be referved fafe and "found for the natural people thereof to keep and inhabit, but that the Captains and ring-leaders of fugitives and rebels might not feize it, and so hold it in captivity and oppression. How "much the Syracusians might have done with me at first, may be easily seen by the example ei-"ther of those Syracusians who conversed among the guards of the Romans, or of the Spanish "Captain Mericus, who yeelded up his garrifon. Yea, and the hardy and refolute courie in the "end taken (although it were with the lateft) by the Syracunans themselves, may sufficiently tellifie the same. Whereby also it may appear, that for all my travel and pain which I have un-"dergone, for all the perils which I have adventured and passed through, about the walls of Sy-" racusa, both by Land and Water, thus long; I have gathered no fruit so sweet and pleasant as "this, that it may be faid, how I was able, yet at last, to win and conquer Syracufa: . Then the Quellor was lent, attended with a guard, unto Nasos, for to enter upon the Kings treafure there, and to keep the fame in fafety. The pillage of the City was given to the fouldiers but there were appointed certain warders over every house of theirs, who were among the garrifons of the Romans, for to fave the fame. Amids many cruel, fpightful, and foul examples of anger, malice, and covetouineis, which happed to be committed during the time of this faccage, it is reported. That in fo great hurliburly as possibly might be, when a City is newly taken, and hungry fouldiers run to rifling. Archimedes was bushly occupied, and sindying upon certein Geometrical figures that he had drawn out in the dust, and happed to be stain by a fouldier, that shew not who he was. Whereat Marcellus was much offended and displeased: and thereupon gave especial order, that he should be honourably enterred: yea, and caused his kinsfolks to be fought out: and all they in remembrance of him, and for his name sake, were not only saved, but allowell accounted of, and had in good reputation. Thus you see in what fort, and by what means especially, Saracuse was won. A City wherein was found such store of wealth and riches, as hardly would have been gotten in Carinage, if it had been forced then: notwithstanding it was able to hold out with Romes, and maintein war with equal force and power.

Some few dayes before the winning of Spracesses, T. Octaerlins with fourscore Gallies, of five ranks of oars, crossed the Seas from Latybeam to Urica, and being entred the gate before day light, chanced to take by the way certain Caricks charged with corn. After he was disbarked and iet a Mandhe wasted grievoully part of the territory about Urica, and returned to the City with boety and prizes of all torts. And the third day after he went from Lightman he returned third ragain with 130 caricks full of corn and other booty: and that com he sent forthwith to Syracesses which if it had not come as it did in good time to help the present necessary, the conquestors as well as the conquered had selt the smart of most extream and grievous stamme.

In the same summer, the Roman Generals in Spain (who almost for two years had done no memorable act there, but warred by policy and flratagems, more than by force of arms) diflodged from their forts and winter harbors, and joyned their armies together. Then they called a Councel, where they jumped with one general accord in this opinion. That confidering all this while they had effected this much only, as to empeach and stay Aldrubal from all means of passing over it into Itely, it was now high time to make an end at once of the war in Spain. And to effect and bring this to palle, they supposed verily that their strength was well amended and sufficient, by reason that in the winter time they had levied and put in arms thirty thouland Celtiberians. Now the Carthaginians had in Spain then, no fewer than three armies. Afdrabal the fon of Gifgo, and Mago, were encamped with all their forces together, distant from the Romans almost five dayes journey: Afdrubal the fon of Amilear, an ancient warrior, and an old Captain in Spain, was fomewhat neerer with his whole power, before a City named Antergie. Him the Roman Gemerals were defirous to defeat and vanquish first : and in good hope they were, that they had firength enough and to spare, for to accomplish that: mary, this was their only doubt and fear, left upon the discompture of him, the other Afdrubatand Mago would for fear retire themselves of into the unpassable woods, and take the wilds and mountains, and so maintein a long war. They supposed therefore it was the best course to divide their power between them in two parts, and at once to compais the whole war of Spain. And thus they agreed to part their forces; namely, That P. Cornelius should lead two third parts of the army consisting of Romans and allies, against Mago and Afdrubal: and that (n. Cornelius with the other third part of that old army should joyn with the Celtiberians, and war against Afdrabal the Barchine [i, son of Amilear abovefaid.] Both these Captains with their hofts fet out together in their journy, putting the CeltiDerians before in the vanguard, and encamped neer the City Anatorgis in the fight of their enemies, having but the river running between. And there Cn. Scipio thaid behind, and made his abode with the power aforefaid: but P. Scipio went conward to perform that part of the war which he purposed and intended. Alabaha after he perceived that there hay in camp but a finall power of Romans, and that their whole hope relied upon the aids of the Celtiberians: a so one that could well skill of the falshood and treachery of the barbarous people, but especially of all those nations, among whom he had been so long a soldier: by reason that both camps, as well his own as the other of the Romans, were full of Spaniards, he used by the means of reciprocal commerce of their language; for to have secret speech and conference with the principal heads of the Celtiberi-Bans, and to treated with them, that in consideration of a great sum of money, they were persuaded and yeelded in the end to withstaw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the slip, had the principal heads of the Celtiberi-Bans, as they supposed the constant of the principal heads of the Celtiberi-Bans, as the supposed the constant of the supposed the

B ans, and to treated with them, that in confideration of a great fum of money, they were perfusaded and yeelded in the end to withdraw all their forces from thence, and give the Romans the flip, And this they supposed was not so beinous and odious a fact. For why? they were not dealt withal to turn their swords upon the Romans, and to war against them: again, they were not dealt as good pay and wages to fire fill, and not to serve, as was sufficient to bind them for to bear arms, and sight: and last of all, rest it self, and sleeping in a whole skin, together with their return home to their own, and the joy and pleasure of visiting their riends, and seeing their goods and lands, were plausible and pleasing inducements to every man. And therefore the Captains themselves were no sooner drawn thereto, than the very multitude. Over and besides, to strike it dead sure, they shood in no sear of the Romans (being so few as they were) that they could possibly keep c them perforce. And surely, this might well lerve, to be a Caveat for Roman Captains every here.

C them perforce. And firely, this might well ferve, to be a Caveat for Roman Captains ever hereafter, and fuch precedent examples and inflances as this, may fland in flead of good ledions indeed, to reach them how they truft again the aids of foreiners; and never to relic themselves so much upon them, but that they alwayes have in their camp the greater part of their own forces, and the more number of their natural fouldiers. All on a suddain therefore the Celtiberians dislodged, plucked up flandards, and departed from them, and never bad them farewel. And when the Romans demanded the cause of this change, yea, and besought and importunt dethem to tarry, of wars in their own country. Scipio seeing that these Allies of his were so slippery, and could neither be intreated nor enforced to stay: and that himself alone without them was not able to make his part good with the enemy; and to joyn again with his brother, was a thing impossible tick want of all other good means, for the prelent, when he faw no remedy elfe, determined to retire himself as far backward as he could: having this especial care above all things, not to encounter and joyn battail with the enemy in plain field, without some advantage, who now was passed over the river, and traced him hard at heels in his dismarch.

About the same time P. Scipio stood in the like terms of fear, but in more danger by the coming of a new enemy, and that was M. saiffs the young Prince, who then was a friend and pensionary fouldier of the Carthaginians: but afterwards mighty and renowned for his amity with the Romans, He with his Numidian Hossemen first encounted P. Scipio, as he marched on his journey, and afterwards both day and night molested and troubled him very shrewdly: in such fort, that

E not only he would intercept and catch up those that were gone out wandering and straigling far from the camp, a stilling or foraging, and send them short of home; but also ride braving even before the camp. Many a timewould he venture, yes, and enter upon the thickest of the standing corp de guard, and make foul work and trouble among them. By night also he sided oft to make many starts upon a suddain, and assail the gates of the camp and the sampler, and put them in exceeding great frights. So as the Romans at no time, nor in no place could be at rest and quiet for him, but ever in sear and doubt of some shrews turn or other by him: so as they were driven to keep within their rampier, cut off from the side of all commodities abroad, and in a manner as good as besieged: and more streightly yet were they like to be beleaguered, in case such sides, who was coming (as the rumor went) with 7500 Suesserans, were once joyned with the Carthaginians.

Leaving therefore a mean guard to keep the camp, and T. Fenreius his Lieutenant, as Provost and Captain, he set out at midnight, and meeting with his enemies, joyned batrail with them: but they skirmished rather by loos companies in their march, than with their united forces in set and pight field. Howbeit, the Romans had the better hand so much as it was, considering what a confused and disorderly conflict there might be. But the Numidian Cavalry, whom Scipio thought he was secured of, and that they were not aware of him, all on a suddain slanked the sides of the Romans, and mightily terrised them. So as the Romans were to maintain battail on all hands and were at a stand, and in doubt with themselves against which enemy to turn first, or what way with a close couched squadron to give the venture for to break through. hattailon, which environed their Captain, feeing Scipio falling from his Horse ready to die, in the great 10y and mirth fet up a cheerful shout, and ran all over the army, and caried glad ridings that the Roman General was flain. This voice being once spreadall abroad, caused both the enemies to take themselves undoubtedly for victors, and the Romans to make no other accompt but they were vanquished. Whereupon they having lost their Leader, began forthwith to flie out of the field. But as it was no hard matter for them to make a lane and break through among the Numidians, and other auxiliary fouldiers lightly armed; fo to escape and go cleer away from io many Horse, and Footmen also, who were as swift on foot as the horsemen, it was almost impossible. Thus they were more in manner slain in their flight now, then in their fight before. And there had not one remained alive, but that the day being far spent already, and t toward evening, the night came on apace and overtook them. The Carthaginian Captains, and those also of Affrick, taking the full benefit of this their good fortune, slept not their businesse. por made delay: but presently after the battail; scarcely allowing their souldiers so much sleep as would content nature, marched in great hast toward Afdrubal the fon of Amilear: making accompt assuredly, that when they had joyned their power with his, they should break theneck of this war, and end it once for all. When they were come to him, great joy and gratulation there was between the Captains and the hofts of both fides, for this fresh victory newly atchieved: and feeing they had already defeated fo brave a warrior and great commander, together with his whole army, they made no doubt but expected certainly to have another hand as good

The news verily of this fo great a foil and overthrow, was not yet come unto the Romans: but yet they were ftrucken into a fad dump and deep filence, and more than that, into a fecret prefage and fore-deeming of some unsucky tidings: as commonly mens mindsuse to fore-give and tell aforehand, when there is some mischief and ill toward them. The General himself befides that he saw he was abandoned and fortaken of his affociats, and knew the forces of the enumies so mightily reenforced; by good conjectures and guesses, yea, and by very reason, was induced to suspect some loss and calamity received already, rather than enclined to hope after any good success and happy speed. For thus he discoursed with himself: How is it possible that Afdrubal and Mago should bring their armies together without conflict, unless my brother be slain in fight, or have forgotten to be a warrior? how cometh it that he withflood them not? or how r happeth it that my brother followed not hard after them fast upon their backs? At least wife, if he had not been able to keep them alunder, but that both Captains and armies must needs meet and joyn in one, yet he himfelf me thinks, at leastwife would have come by this time to his brother and brought his own power to his. In this perplexity and anguish of spirit, he thought yet, for the present time, that the only good course he could take, was to withdraw himself back from thence as far as he could: and to all that one night unwares to his enemies (who follow only were quiet) he marched a great way, and won much ground of them. The next morning, for soon as the enemies perceived that the Romans were dislodged and gone, they sent out the Numidian light Horsemen, and began to follow ofter them apace, and purioed them as fast as possibly they could : and before night the Numidian Cavalry had overtaken them, and skirmished M one while with the tail of their march, another whiles at their fides and flanks, and gave them no rest: whereat the Romans made as it were a stand, and began to defend and save their army as well as they could: yet with great wariness and regard of security, Scipio encouraged them so to fight, as they might march on ftill and gain ground, before the Infantry overtook them. But as one while the army was one foot, and another while flood fill, in long time they rid but a little ground. And Scipio seeing the night draw on apace, reclaimed his fouldiers from farther skirmishes: and after he had rallied them together, he retired with them up to a little mount, no sufficient place (God wot) of safe retreat for an army, especially so troubled and affrighted already, yet higher than any other place all about. There the first thing that he did, was to bestow the baggage and cavalry in the mids within his forces: and at first the infantry ranged round about in N a ring, made no difficult matter of it to pur by the violent charge of the Numidian Horsemen. But afterwards when the three Generals marching with three full armies approached, their Captain Scipio perceiving that he was never able to keep that place without some fortification, began to cast his eye about, and to bethink with himself, by what means possible he might empale himself round about as it were with a rampier : but the hill was so naked of wood, and the soil of the ground besides so stony and craggy, that he could neither finde any underwood sit to cut out stakes for a pallisado nor earth meet to make turfs for a bank, or minable for a trench: and in one wood, all things untoward and unhandiome for a mound, and to fortifie withal. Neither was there any place there, to speak of, so steep and upright, but the enemy might at easemount up and climb it. All the hill on every fide, had a gentle rifing and ascent up to the top. How- O beit, to represent some shew and resemblance yet of a rampier, they were for red to take their pack taddles, with their packs tied fast unto them, and so round about to pile them and raise them to the usual height of a mure: And where there wanted pack saddles to make up the work, there they were fain to heap together, all forts of fardels, truffes, and other carriages, and to put them between the enemies and them. The Carthaginian armies when they were come, matched very eafily up against the Hill. But the new fashion and manner of their defences and fortifications, was very strange unto them, so as at the first the souldiers marvelled much

The feve and memier Book of T. Livius.

A and were au onied thereat, and stood still. But their Captains on all sides cried out mon them. And why stand ye gaping (fay they) so ; and do not pull in peeces and pluck away that soolish bable there, good to make sport with ? A very toy, that women and children would scarce stand about thus long? Why, the enemie is taken already in a pinfold, and lieth lurking and hiding himself behind the truffes and other carriages. After this manner (I say) the leaders rated at the fouldiers. But it was not so easy a matter, either to get over that Barricado of the packs, or to remove and rid them out of the way, as they lay piled clole against them; nor yet to unfold and unwrap the pack-laddles, lying overwhelmed as they did, under the packs, and entangled together with them. Thus they were hindred and staid a long time: and when at length they had put this bag and baggage aside that was set in their way, and made passage and entrance for the armed men, B and that in divers places, the campand tents were foon taken on all fides, ere a man could turn about: and so being few to many, and frighted men to late conquerors, no marvel if they were killed and hewn in pieces in every place. Howbeit, many of the fouldiers having fled for reinge into the forreits neer by elcaped into the camp of P. Stipio, whereof T. Fonteius his Lieutenant had the charge. As fo. Cn. Scipio some write that he was flain upon that mount at the first onlet and affault made by the enemies : others report that with a few others he fled into a Tower hard. by the camp: and that there was a fire made round about it, and so when the gates thereof were burned, which by no violent means otherwise they could break open, the enemies entred and took it, and they within were killed every one, Captain and all.

Thus Cn. Scipio came to his end, in the feventh year after that he went into Spain, and on the C nine and twentieth day after that his brother loft his life. Their death was bewailed and lamented no icis over all Spain than at Rome, Por among the cicizens at home one part of their forrow they took for the lois of the atmies, another part went for the distraction and alienation of the Province and a third again was spent in the cogitation of the publick calamity: but Spain from one end to the other mourned only for their Governors and Captains, and had a great miffe of them. And Cneus of the twain, was more bewailed, becaused he had been longer time their ruler, and had won the favour and affection of men, and possessed their hearts before the other: and was the first that ever gave them in those parts a proof and tast of the Romans just and tem-

When the army was thus defeated and brought to nothing, so as Spain seemed utterly lost, p there arole one man yet, that recovered all again, and brought the decaied flate to the former perfection. There was in the army one L. Martius, the fon of Septimius, a Gentleman and Knight of Roses, a torward young manifor contage and wit, far above the degree and condition wherein he was born. Befides this excellent and most toward disposition of his by nature; he had great helps by the discipline and instruction of Cn. Scipio: under whom, for so many years he was trained and had learned all military knowledge and skill meet for a fouldier. This Martin, what by rallying the disperied fouldiers who were fled, and what by drawing others out of fundry garrions had raited and aftembled together a reasonable good power, and joyned with T. Fonteius, the Lieutenam aforefaid of P. Seipio. But the Roman Knight, above all others, grew to fo great credit and reputation among all the fouldiers, that when they had fortified their camp within the E river Iberus; and were determined among themselves, to chuse one General over the armies, in a folemn affembly of fouldiers, even by their own military election: they went one by one in course one after another, unto the main corps de guard that defended the tampier, and to the other wards belonging unto the camp until they had all given their voyces: and so by general confent created him their General. All the time which they had after, (and that was but small) they employed in fortifying their hold, and conveying thirher corn and victuals: and what chargefoever was imposed by him upon the fouldiers, the same they executed readily and willingly, and without any shew that their hearts were difmayed, and cast down any jot at all. But after that news was brought, that Astrabal the fon of Gifgs, was coming against them, to dispatch clean the reliques of the war, that he had passed over there and approached neer: and the son diers saw once the Fignal of battel put forth unto them by this new General; calling to mind, what noble wartiors they had served under but a while before; what worthy leaders they were wont to have and with how puissant armies they nied heretofore to go to the field; they fell a weeping every one. shaking and bearing their heads: some lift up and retched one their hands to heaven, blaming and accusing the Gods: others lay along poon the ground, calling every one upon his own Captain by special name; Neither could their pitcous moans and plaints be staid not withstanding the Cenaurious encouraged what they could, the fouldiers of their companies : not withflanding (I fay) that Martins himself fomerimes spake them fair, fometimes rebuked them, for giving themselves to such soolish and vain puling like women and not rather resolve to raise up their hearts, and with him to quicken and whet their floriacks in defence of themselves and of the common-@ weal, and not to fuffer their former Captains and Leaders to lie dead and unfevenged. By this time now, all on a fuddain, the shout of the enemies was descried, and the sound of the trumpets were within hearing being come close under the tampier. Whereupon all at once, turning their forrow and weeping into anger and indignation, they ranevery man to his armorand weapon: and as if they had been horn mad they hafteed from all parts to the gates and entries of the camp, and charged upon the enemies as they came carelelly and without order and array. Immedistely this unexpected and suddain object, stroke an exceeding fear into the Carthaginians

as wondring from whence to many enemies thould flart up to toon, confidering the armies were a to lately clean in a manner destroyed; and how it came to passe, that being newly vaneuished and put to flight they should be so stout so bold and consident of their own selves ; who a Gode name, should be their General, after the two Scipios were flain; what Captain and Governor had they over the camp; and who gave out the fignal of battail: marvelling (Ifay) at these premiffes, and fo many particulars, that they once imagined not afore, at first hand they wist not what to do, but as amazed men, began to give ground and retire; but afterwards, being Ail fiercely followed upon with a violent charge, they were plainly beaten back and put to flight And verily, either there had been a foul havock and flaughter of them that fled, or a rash and dangerous enterprise for them who would have followed the chace: but that Martius hasfined r to found the retreat, and opposing himself against the foremost ensigns of the vanguard, yea, and taking hold of some of them himself, staid the main battail and repressed their violence, who were upon the point already to pursue them with heat. And so he reduced them back again into the camp, as greedy as they were fill of murder, and thirfly of bloudshed. The Carthaginians, who at the first were driven from the rampier, and for fear hasined away; after that they saw none to follow them, supposed they had been asraid, and therefore staid still: whereupon they departed to their camp again in rechlels manner, fair and foftly. And as careless as they were in their retire thither, fo negligent were they in guarding the same: for although their enemies were neer, vet they remembred and thought again, that they were but the tail and reliques of two armies, vanquilhed and defeated a few dayes before. Upon this resolute perswasion of theirs, and bale conceit of the enemies, they were very negligent every way within their camp: whereof Martins having by his espial, certain intelligence, resolved upon a designment, which at the first sight seemed more like a project of hazard, than an enterprise of hardines; and it was no more, but even upon a bravery to let upon the enemy in his own camp, and give him a camilado. For as he thought it an easier emprese, to force the hold and pavilions of Asarabal, being but one, than to defend and keep his own, in case three armies and three Captains should joyn together: so he considered withal, that either if he fped well in this exploit, he should restore and set upright again unto the Romans, the decayed and proftrate State of Spain: or if he were discomfited and put back, yet by giving the adventure first upon the enemies, he should not be altogether contemned, and of no reputation. But left this attempt fo fuddain, and the terror and error which may fall out inther night-time, should happen to trouble this his designed plot, and the course of his good forume; he thought it not amiss, to make a speech unto his souldiers, and to exhort and encourage them afore-hand. And therefore calling them together to a general audience, in this manner hedif-

And therefore ler us wait no lon-"ger than the commodious opportunity of the next night. Go ye then a gods bielling make much "of your felves, take your repatt and repose, that yemay be frest and lusty to break into your ene-"mies hold with the same resolute courage, wherewith erewhile ye desended your own. The fouldiers, as they gladly gave ear to this new counfell of their new captain, to, the more audaci-Fous and adventurous that it was, the better it pleated them. The rest of the day behind they spent in furbishing and making ready their harnels and weapons, and inchetishing their bodies, yea, and the better part of the night they flept quierly. And to at the relief of the fourth watch they

Now were there other companies also of Carthaginians, beyond this next camp above faid, about fix miles diffant from thence, A fiollow way and valley there lay between, franching thick of trees. In the midft of this wood, for a furlong space well near, he bestowed closely cohort of socmen, yex, and certain horsemen of Romans: but by his leave this was bud a craftly and flie trick, borrowed of the Carthaginians. Thus the midtle way being intercepted and taken up, the rest of theforces were conducted in a fall-march toward the enemies in the next camp. And finding no G grands before the gates, no Sentinels upon the rampier, they entred in as it had been into their own hold; and no man made reliftance: then they founded trumpets, and gave the alarm. Some fall to hilling of the enemies half affeep; others fling dry litter and firaw for to kindle fire upon their hues and pavilions ; other some again keep the gates, that none should ifine forth So the fire, the others, and mathere all rogether, put them our of their right wits, and made them, as it were, befides themselves ; that neither hear they could, noryet make any shirt for themselves. Unarmed and nathed men fell among the Bands of armed fouldiers. Some run in halle to to the gates, others finding the water and paffages befor run up to the campier: and look as any escaped and got away from thence by that means he flieth straightwaies directly toward the other camp. Where they H were caught up by the cohort of footmen, and the cornet of horiemen, which rose up suddenly out of their Ambuscado: and being enclosed onevery side, were killed to the last man. And yet. if it had been any ones good hap to have escaped from thence with life, so swiftly, and with so great expedition, the Romans after they had got the nearer camp, fped themselves to the other. that he could not have recovered it before them, to bring news of the defeat. And even there likewise, the farther they were off from their enemy, the more negligent they were: and became some also a little before day were slipt away a forraging, fuelling, and plundering, the Romans found every thing more loofe and out of order, than in the other camp. Their weapons only flood reared up in their corps de guard, the fouldiers themselves were unarmed, either sitting and lying all along on the ground, or walking up and down before the gates, and under the rampier. With these fouldiers so secure, so retchless, so disarmed and disordered (the Romans being yet in their hot bloud, and not cooled upon their fresh massacre, and more than that, lufty and brag for their new victory) began to make a fray, and to skirmish. But the Carthaginians were not able to keep them out of the gates. And so within the Camp there was a hot and cruell fight: for, from all pirts thereof, they can together upon the first alarmthat arose in the very beginning of the tumult and fourfling. And long had that skirmish continued, but that the Romans bucklers and targets feen all bloudy were a patternunto the Carthaginians of a former execution; and thereupon drave them into a mighty fear. This fearfull fight caused them all to turn back and take their heels: and thus as many of them as escaped killing got out by heaps wheresoever they could make shift to find way, and were clean turned out of their camp, and all that they had. So in the com-K pass of one day and night, by the conduct and direction of L. Martius, there were two encamped holds forced and won from the enemies: in which there were 37000 of the enemies flain, faith Claudius, who translated the Annals of Acidius out of the Greek tongue into the Latine and 2 830 taken pritoners befides the gain of a mighty rich booty. In which pillage there was found a shield of filver weighing 138 pound, with the image and portraiture of Asarbal the Barchine. Val. ring Antias recordeth, that the camp only of Mago was taken, and feven thouland men flain and that in another battell with Afdrubal, upon a fally forth, there died ten thousand, and 4330 were taken prisoners. Pifo writeth, that when Mago followed after our men in an hot and diforderly chace (for they feemed to give back and retreat) there were five thouland men killed by the train of an ambush, But all writers do blazon the great honour and same of Duke Marting. And L befides the very truth of his glorious name, they make mention also and speak of some miracles: namely, that as he made the Oration unto his fouldiers, there was seen a flaming fire burning from his head, without any fente and feeling of his to the great wonder and fear of the fouldiers that flood about him: and that in the memoriall of his brave victory over the Carthaginians, there remained in the temple of Jup. untill the Capitoll was burned that foresaid shield, with the Image of Aldrubal, and it was called Martius his shield. After this, Spain was quiet for a long time. whiles both fides after to many overthrows given and taken between them, were loath to hazard the main chance in one battell.

In the time that these affairs passed in Spain, Marcellus upon the winning of Syracuse, having fet all other things in order throughout Sicily, with fuch faithfulnels and upright integrity, that M not only he greatly augmented his own glory, but also enlarged the majetty of the people of Rame, brought over to Rome all the goodly and beautiful ornaments of that City, their graven and moltenimages, their pictures and painted tables, whereof there was great flore in Syracule. These braveries (no doubt)at the first were no more but the spoils of enemies, and lawfully acquired in right of war and conquest, But from thence began our great love and liking to the cunning workmanship of Grecian Attisans: and from hence came afterwards our licentiousness and outragein spoiling and robbing, so commonly & ordinarily, all facred and profane places, where these things were to be had: which staid not so, but proceeded and turned at length to the spoiling of the Roman gods themselves, and to that very first Temple which by Marcellus was beautified and adorned principally above the reft. For strangers and forrein travellers used in pilgrimage to vistan the Temples which were dedicated by Marcellus at the gate Capena, in regard only of the most rare and fingular workmanship of the ornaments in that kind, of which at this day there is very little or nothing to be feen.

Now from all City well-near of Sicily, there resorted Embassies unto him: as their causes were divers and unlike to their conditions were not all one. As many as before the winning of Syracule, had either not rebelled at all, or became reconciled and in favour again, they were accepted in the quality of faithfull Allies, and made much of: those who for sear after the loss of Spracufe, yielded were reputed as conquered, and received laws and conditions at the will and pleafure of the Conqueror. There remained yet no small reliques of war about Agrigentum for the Romans to dispatch namely, Epicides and Hanno, the Captains of the former war: and a third, sent O new from Annibal in the room of Hippocrates, a Citizen of Hippof his countrimen name him Mutines) descended from the Libypkanices, aman of Action, and one who under Annibal had been brought up, and taught allfeats of arms, and skill of warfare. Unto his charge were committed by Epicides and Hanno the Numidian Auxiliaries, with whom he over ran all the countries belonging to the enemies: he went unto all the Confederats, and so wrought with them to continue fast in their allegiance, and to fend aids to every one in due time accordingly: in such fort, that

A within short time he got himself a great name throughout all Sicily, so as the favorits and faction of the Carthaginians had no greater hope in any than in him. And therefore both Captains, as well Hanno the Carthaginian, as Epicides the Syracusan, who for a time had been pentup within the walls of Agrigentum, bearing themselves as well upon the fidelity as policy of Mutines, boldlv adventured to come forth of the walls of Agrigentum, and upon the river Himera encamped themselves. Whereof Marcellus having intelligence, forthwith removed with all his power and firehim down encamped, almost four miles from the enemy, minding to wait and expect what they did or went about But Mutines gave him neither opportunity of place to relt him long, nor respite of time to take counsell in, but crossed the river, and with exceeding terrour, and tumultu-Rous noise affailed the flanding guards of his enemies: yea, and the morrow after gave them bat-

tell as it were in a pitcht field, and drave them within their holds and fortifications. But being called from thence by occasion of a mutiny of Numidians within the Camp (who to the number almost of three hundred were departed to Heracles Minos) he went to appeale their moods, and to reclaim them to due obedience: but he gave the rest of the Captains (by report) a great charge and express warning, not to fight with the enemy, howsoever they did in his absence. But both the Captains were greatly offended thereat, and Hanno especially, who was already male-content, and repined at his glory: What? faith he, thinketh Mutines, a bale Affican, and not of the right flamp neither, to gage and rule me a Carthaginian Generall, sent with Commission from the Senat and people? He pertwaded therefore Epicides effectually to pais over the river, and to firike C a battell for quoth he, if we should stay for him, and then hap to have a fortunate day of it and win the victory, all the honour no doubt shall redound to Mutines, Beye fore, Marcellus thought this a great indignity, that he who had repulsed at Nola Annibal. even when he bare himself so bravely upon his sresh victory at Canne, should give one soot to these petty enemies, vanquished already by him both by sea and land - whereupon he commanded his fouldiers to arm in all haste, and to bring forth the standards and enfigus. But as he was arranging his men in battell array, there came riding unto him all on the four, with bridle on the horle neck, ten Numidians from our of the army of the enemies, with these tidings and intelligencessaffuring them, "That their countrimen, who first were offended and discontented by occasi-"on of that mutiny aforelaid, wherein three hundred of their company departed and went away D" to Heraclea: and then afterwards, because they saw their own head and leader, by the practice

"of those other Captain, who maligned and envied his glory, sent far enough out of the way, ee ven against the very day when the battell should be fought; were not disposed at all to fight, "but would fit still and not stir. A kind of people these were, deceitfull otherwise, and used to break promife; howbeit now, they were just and true of their word. Upon this, as the Romans sook better heart unto them, (for there was a speedy pursevant or coursier sent throughout the battaillons from company to company, for to fignific unto them, that the enemy was disappointed and abandoned of his Cavalry, whom they feared most of all other) fothe enemies were mightily dismaied and put in fear: for over and besides, that they had no help from them who were the greatest strength of their army, they were in a deep fear lest their own horsemen would E fer upon them. By which occasion the conflict was not great, for at the first shout and shock given, well it was seen which way the game would go, and the matter was soon determined. The

Numidians, who at the first encounter, and during the conslict, had stood quiet in both points of the battell, seeing their own fellows turn back and flie, bare them only company for a while as they fled : but after that they perceived them all to make haste forfear to Agrigentum: fearing allo themselves there to be besieged among them, slipt away every one to their own Cities, Many thousands were there slain and taken prisoners: and eight elephants besides taken alive. This was the last field fought by Marcellus in Sicily: upon this victory he returned to Syracuse. By this time now was the year almost come about and growing to an end. And therefore at Rome the Scnate decreed, that F. Cornelius the Prattof should fend letters to the Confuls, lying before Capua, pur-Foorting this tenour: That for a for a function was far from them, and no great matter of consequence like to be performed the while at Capua; the one of them (if they thought so good) should repair to Rome, for to create new Magistrates in the room of the old. The Consuls having received the letters, agreed between themselves and took order, that Claudius should go to hold and accomplish the solemn election of Magistrates: and Futuiss remainstill at Capua, So Claudisecreated new Cost. Cn. Fulvius Centimolus, and P. Sulpitius Galbathe fon of Servius: a man that had not born any curule office of state before, After these were Preziots chosen, L. Cornelius Lentulus, M. Cornelius Cethegus, C. Sulpisius, C. Calpurnius Pifo, Unto Pifo befell the jurifdiction within the City. Sulpitins had the government of the Province Sicily. Cerhegus of Apulia; and Land tulus, of Sardinia. The Confuls had the government of their Provinces prorogued for to continue G one year longer.

Nnibal encamped himselfe at three miles and from Rome, fast upon theriver Anio. Himselfin Aporfon, accompanied with two thousand men of arms, rode to the gate Capena, for to view the fit of the City. And normithstanding that for three daies space the armies of both sides were come into the field ready embattelled, yet they never joyned in conslict, by reason of the tempessions and stormy weather: But over as they were returned again into their Camp, presently it provedsair. Capua was won by Q. Fulvius, and Appius Claudius the Pro-Consuls. The Nobles and principal Citizens of Capua poisoned themselves. When as their Senators stood bound to stakes (for to be whipped) and thento lofe their heads, there came letters from the Senate of Rome unto the Pro-Conful Q. Fulvius, with direstion to pare their lives: but before that he would read them, he put them up into his bosome, and willed K the ministers or executioners to let the Low have the comfe, and to do their office, and so he went through with the execution. It kapned that in a folorism affembly of the people there was much debate and quefion, who hould govern as L. Deputy the Province of Spain: and when no man was willing to undertake that charge, P. Scipio, he fon of that Publius who was flain in Spain, made offer to go that vorage, and by the voyces generally of the people, and with one accord of all he was thither fent. In one day he assaulted and alfo forced New-Carthage. being a young man, not fully 24 year old. And there went an opinion of him shat he was descended of some heavenly race: both for that himself, after he was come to leventeen years of age, and had put or his mans robe, converfed within the Capitoll, and also because there was a fnake or ferpent feen ofsentimes in his mothers bedchamber. This book containeth besides the affairs in Sicily: the amity concluded with the Etolians: and the war against the Acarnanians and Phi-L lip King of the Macedonians.

The fix and twentieth Book of T. Livius.

Neus Fulvius Centimalus, and P. Selpitius Galha the Confuls, when they had entredinto their Magistracy upon the Ides of March, assembled the Senators into the Capitoll, where they consulted with the LL about the state of the Common-weal, concerning the administration of the wars, and as touching the Provinces and the Armies. Q. Fulvius and Ap. Claudius, the Confuls of the former year, continued ttill their rule and full command, with M the charge of the same forces which they had before under their hands. And over and befides, they were expressy commanded, not to depart from Capua (before which they lay at fiege) until they had forced and won the City. For at that time the Romans among all their other affairs were most amused upon it: not so much for anger and malice, (whereit they had never against any one City greater and juster cause) as in this regard, that being a state so noble and mighty, like as by revolting first it had drawn and induced certain other Cities to do the same: so if it were recovered and regained, like it was to reduce their affections again to look back and return unto their old allegiance and obedience to their wonted figniory of Rome. The Prætors also of the former year, M. Junius in Tufcany, and P. Sempronius in Gaul, continued in their places of regiment, with two legions a piece under their conduct the same which they had before, And fo M. Marcellus B. N. mained as Pro-Conful behind in Sicily, for to finish and dispatch the reliques of the warthere, with the power of that army which he had already; and had commission (if need were of new supply) to make up the number of his companies, out of those legions which were commanded by P. Cornelius the Vice-Pretor in Sicily; provided alwaies, that he chose no fouldier out of those bands, unto whom the Senat had flatly denied, either licence to be discharged, or pasport to teturn home into their country, before the war was fully ended. Unto C. Sulpitius, whole lot it was to govern the Province of Sicily, were affigued those two legions, which P. Cornelius had before wich a fresh supply out of the army of Cneus Fulvius, which the last year was shamefully deteated, beaten and put to flight in Apulia. These souldiers, all the fort of them, had the same limitation on of service and no other, appointed and set down by the Senat, as those former who remained after the overthrow at Canna. And this difgrace they had besides, as well the one company as the other, That they might not winter within any town, nor build them any standing camp for wintring harbours, within ten miles of a City. L. Cornelius the Lord Deputy in Sardinia, was allowed to have the conduct of those two legions which were under the leading of Q. Mutius. And order was given unto the Confuls to levy and enroll a new fupply thereto if need required T. Otacilins and M.Valerius were appointed to guard and defend all the fea-coasts of Sicily and Greece, with

A the help of those Legions and Armadoes which they had already. The Greeks had fifty fail in their fleet, and were manned with one Legion. The Sicilians had one hundred ships, and two Legions to furnish them. So that in this year the Romans maintained three and twenty Legions, to wage war both by fea and land.

In the beginning of the year, when the letters of L. Martius were read and scanned in the Senat house, the LL, there assembled, liked well of the contents, and spake highly in the praise of his worthy acts: but many of them were offended at the superscription, because he took upon him the honourableticle of a Pro-Prator in his file, and wrote thus, L. Martins the Pro-Prator to the Senat | confidering, that his command was neither granted by the people, nor allowed and B confirmed by the Senat; "An ill precedent (fay they) it is, and of bad confequence, that Generals " of the field should be chosen by armies, and that the folemnity of Elections, to devoutly begun "in the name of the gods, and with the religious observation of the Bird-flight, frould now be "transferred into the Camps and Provinces far from Laws and Magistrates, and committed to "the inconsiderate wills of rash affectionate souldiers. And when some there in place were of opinion, that the matter should be put in quession at the Council Table, it was thought better to defer that consultation, untill those gentlemen of service, that brought the Letters from Martius, were gone and departed, As concerning corn and apparell for the army, they agreed to write back unto him, that the Senat would take order and provide for both: but they would not allow in any cause to give him this addition, and to write [To Martins the Pro-Prator] less that they might C feem to approve the very fame thing by their prejudice and doom aforehand, which they had left for to be decided and determined afterwards. When the Gentlemen aforefaid had their dispatch, and were difmissed, the first thing that the Consuls propounded was it, and no other: and generally they jumped in this one point, for to deal with the Tribunes of the peoples, that with all speed possible they would move the Commons, and propound unto them, for to know, who their will and pleature was should be sent L. Deputy into Spain, for to have the government of that army whereof Cn. Scipio, L. Generall, had the conduct.

This matter, I say, was treated of with the Tribunes, and a bill preferred thereof unto the Commons: but there was another greater contention in terms, that had possessed their minds already. For C. Sempronius Blasus had commenced a criminall action against Cn. Estevius, accusing Dhim for the lots of the Army in Apulia, and ceased not in all the affemblies of the people to make invectives against him, charging him, "That being Captain Generall, through his much fol- The Oration "ely ignorance, and rashness the had brought his army into a place of danger reproving him more- of T. Simproni-Sover, and laying, That never any Captain but Cn. Behold the difference between Cnous Fulvins, and E"T.Sempronius. This man having the leading of an army of bondslaves, by discipline, good ora der and government, within short time brought his souldiers to that good pass, that there was "not one of them all throughout the army remembred and regarded how bately he was born. fand of what parentage descended, but all in generall bare themselves so, that they were to their "friends a fure defence, and to their enemies a fearful teffor; and after that he had recovered their "at Beneventum, & other Cities, (as it were, out of the thaws of Annibal the reflored and delive-"redthem fate & found to the people of Rome, Whereas contrariwise Cn: Fulvius having received "an army of Roman Citizens, well and worshipfully born, liberally and honefuly brought up, had "taught them servile vices fit for slaves, and so trained them, that with their friends and allies they "were Rout, proud, and unruly; and among their enemies were cowards & very dastards: & fofar ~ F "Anorthey were to bear off the violence of the Carthaginians that they were not able to abide " so much as their first cry and shout. And no marvel I assure you, that the souldiers could not slick to it in the battel, and hold out manfully ; when the General himfelf was the first that ran away " beautly. I rather wonder at it that any of them flood to it and died in the field, and were not all "of them as fearful as Co. Fulvius, and rook not heels with him for company. Yet C. Flami-"nius, L. "Fulvising he was in manner the only man that returned to Rome with news of the army defea-"ted and overthrown. The aniwer of Cz.Fulviss.

Thus much spake the plaintifi C. Sempronius Blafus. The defendant on the other fide shifted all the blame from himlelf, and laid the whole fault upon his fouldiers, alledging and pleading thus, "That when they called upon him baftily, and with great wilfulnels for to give battell, he "brought them forthirto the field not on that day which they would themselves (for it was late " in the evenire) but the morrow after, when both time and place were meet and convenient for "the purpole: and notwithflanding they were well appointed and orderly embattelled, yet were "they not able to inflain, either the fame or theinty of the cremies, I know not whether, And "when they all fled away amain he alto was carried away in the throng of the rout: like as Varra I "the Conful at the battell before Canna, and as many other Generals elsewhere, And what good "could he have done to the Common weal, in case he had staid behind alone? unless perad-"venture his death might have cured and remedied the publike fores and maladies, or made amends for the common losses. Neither was it for want of victuals, nor for that he light arun-"awares ppon places of diladvantage and danger; nor yet, because he was entrapped within the "trains of an ambush, marching on end forward, without ferding his elpials before that he was "orercome; but even by mere force, by dint of fword, in open feld and in a pight battel. And it was not he could do withall if his own men were fear ull and timorous, and the enemies hardy "and venturous, he had not the rule of their hearts. It is long of every one his own nature to be " either bold or heartlefs.

Two severall daies was he judicially accused, and at both times a fine of money only set upon his head, in case the matter should go against him. At the third Session the witnesses were produced forth, to be deposed and give evidence: and after that he had been shamefully reviled, and charged with all manner of reproaches there were very many upon their oath testified, That the full beginning of the fright and flight both, was occasioned by the Prator himself: and that the touldiers feeing themselves for faken by him, and supposing verily that their Captain and Leader was not affraid of his own shadow but had great reason to lear, they like wife turned their backs and fled. Upon which evidence, the whole Court was to incented against him with anger, that they cried all with one voice, to commence a capitall action, for that he was worthy todie, Whereupon arole a new debate and controversie: for whereas the Tribune had twicebeforelaid L a penall action upon him of money, and now at the third time faid that he would have a jury of life and death go upon him: then he called upon the other Tribunes for their helping hand to mitigate this rigour of the Tribune, But when those his Collegues made answer again and faid, that they would not oppose themselves nor hinder his course, but that he might proceed in the suit at his own good pleasure, more majorum, i. e. [according to the ancient manner used by their forefathers, leither by order of law, or rule of custome, and bring him being but a private person to the triall either of a capitall crime, or penall treipais then Sempronius ipake and faid flatly, that he laid upon him a criminal action of creaton against the State; and requested of C. Calpharnius the L.chief Juftice of the City, for to have a day of hearing and judiciall triall by the people. Then the defendant cast about to help himself by another remedy, namely, in case he could compass that M Q. Fulvius his brother might possibly be present at the Session when he should be judged : who at that time was a man of great credit and reputation, in regard both of the name that went on him for his noble acts, and of that great hope which men had of him, that he was like presently to be Master of Capua. But when this said Q. Fulvius had requested so much by letters, endited to that purpose as effectually as he could devise, and to move commiseration and pity in behalf of the life of his brother, the LL, of the Senat returned this answer unto him again, That it was not for the good of the State that he should depart from Capua: thereupon, before the Sessions day was come, Cn. Fulvius departed of his own accord into extle to Tarquinii, and the Commons made an act and confirmed that banishment of his to be a just, due, and sufficient punishment for

During these businesses at Rome, the whole strength and force of war was bent against Capath and yet the City was rather flraightly beleguered than forcibly affaulted; infomuch as neither the servants or bondmen, nor the common people were able to endure the samine any longer: and fend unto Annibal any messengers, they possibly could not by reason of the straight watchand ward that the Romans kept, so near one unto the other. At length there was a certain Numidian offered to go and to escape clear away, who having taken letters unto Annibal to put him in mind to be as good as his promife, departed in the night, and passed through the mids of the Roman camp, and put the Campans in very good hope, to iffue forth at all the gates; and to make a fally upon the enemy, whiles their power and strength served them. And verily in many fcufflings and skirmishes which they made, they got the better for the most part in horse-fight : O but lightly their footmen had ever the worfe. The Romans for their parts were nothing to much pleased when they had the upperhand at any time, as they were discontented and ill apaid, to receive a toil in any kind of fervice of them, who were not only befreged, but in manner overcome already and conquered. So they devised a means in the end, to make up and supply by industry and policy the defect they had in strength and force. They choic out of all the Legions certain lufty young men, such as for clean strength of body, and lightness withall, were most nimble and

A swift. These had every one of them, a light buckler or target, shorter than commonly horsemen have and seven javelins or darts apiece, four foot long, with iron heads at one end, like as those Javelins have, which they ale to lance that are lightly armed, and begin skirmishes. And every horseman took up one of these behind him on horseback, and used them, both to fit the horse and ride, and also to leap down on foot, with great activity and agility, at the fignall and token given them. Now, when as, after daily practice and exercise, they were able to do it simble enough, and without fear, they advanced forth into the plain, lying between their camp, and the wall of the City, and affronted the horsemen of the Campans as they stood arranged in bartell array: and so soon as they were come within a darts cast, the light javelottiers aforesaid. B dismounted from their horses, at a sign given them: and behold, all of a sudden, our of the Cavalry there was a battaillon of footmen arranged, who charged the men of arms of the enemies, and let flie their shot with great force, dare after dare, which they lanced to thick, that they galled many a horse, and wounded also many horsemen. Howbeir, their fear was much greater, by reason of the strange and unexpected manner of fight. The Roman horsemen seeing their enemies thus affrighted, fet too hard, and charged them upon luftily, chafed them and beat them down even to the City gates. After this, the Romans were the better in horie-fervice also. And hereupon began the manner from henceforth to entertain such light armed javelottiers, called Velites, even among the Legions. The first deviser of this mingling of footmen among the horsemen they say was one Q. Navina a Centurion, and that he was highly honoured by the Generall for C his invention. Whiles things flood thus at Capua, Annibal was greatly distracted in mind, and possessed with two contrary cogitations, whether he shouldgo to gain the Castle of Ta entum, or to rescue and fave the City of Capua. At last the regard of Capua prevailed with him: for he saw that as well friends as enemies depended thereupon, and had their mind and eye wholly bent that way; as being a Citylike to give the very triall and proof, what would the iffue be generally of all the revolt and rebellion from the Romans. Leaving therefore behind him a great part of his carriage in the Brutians country, and all his fouldiers heavily armed, he made halte into Campania, with an elect power of foot and horle, such as he supposed most meet and best appointed for expedition and riddance of way: yet as fast as he marched, there followed after him three and thirty Ele-D phants, and so he sate him down closely in a secret valley behind the mountain Tiff ata, which overlooketh the City Capua. At the first coming he forced the fort called Galaria, and compelled the garriton there to quit the place, and then he turned and opposed himself against the enemies who belieged Capua. But he dispatched certain courriers afore unto Capua to signific unto them at what time he minded to fet upon the camp of the Romans: that they also at the very instant might be ready to iffue forth at every gate of the City to do the like. The Romans having no fore-knowledge by their espials of this occurrence, were mightily terrified : for Annibal himself assailed them one way, and all the Campans as well foot as hotsemen (together with the garrison souldiers of the Carthaginians under the leading of Bostar and Hanno their captains) fallied out another way. The Romans therefore being drivento their shifts, as well as they might in so Esudden and searfull a case, had an eye to this, not to make head altogether one way, and so to leave the rest quite without defence; therefore they divided their forces in this manner among themselves : Appius Claudius opposed himself against the Campans : and Fulvius against Annibal. Clauding Nero the Vice-Prator, with the horsemen belonging to the fixth legion, quartered upon the way that leadeth to Sueffula: and C. Fulvius Flaceus the Lieutenant with the horiemen of Allies, took up his standing, and planted himself over-against the river Vulturnus. The battell began not after the usuall manner, only with shouts and outcries, but besides all other clamours of men neighing of horses, and rustling of armour, there was a multitude of Campans good for no other service of war, placed upon the wals, who together with ringing and sounding of basons and veffels of braffe (as the manner is in the still dead time of the night, when the moon is in the Feclipse) made such an hideous noise, that it caused even them that were in fight to be amused thereupon, and to liften after it. Appius with small ado repulsed the Campans from the trench and rampier. But Fulving on the other part had more trouble to deal with Annibal and the Carthaginians, who charged so fiercely upon him, that the fixth legion there gave ground and retreated : which being once beat back, a Squadron of Spaniards and three Elephants passed forwards as far as the rampier, and had already broken through the main battell of the Romans: but they were in suspence between doubtfull hope and present danger, thinking one while to break through and pass into the Camp; and doubtfull another while to be excluded from the rest of their companies. Palvius seeing this sear of the Legion, and perill wherein the Camp stood, encourageth and exhorteth Q. Navius and other principall Centurions, to affail valiantly, to kill and hew in pieces that one company of the enemies which were figh-Gting under the counterscarp. "For all now lieth a bleeding, quoth he, and in extream hazard: "for either you mult give the enemies way, and then wil they more eafily enter into the camp, then "they had already pierced through the thick fquadrons of the battell; or elie ye must defeat and "flay them in the place, even under the trench. And that (quoth he) were no difficult piece of ler-"vice, considering they are but few in number, severed and shut out clean from the succour of "theirfellows: and the same Roman bargaillon which seemeth now disbanded and open, whiles "it is affrighted, if so be it would make head and turn both sides upon the enemy, were able to

" compass round and environ them, and put them to a doubtinhazard, yea, and cut them in pie-H ces within the midft. Navins had no fooner heard the General speak these words, but he caught the entign of the second band of Haltari from the entigh-bearer, and displaied it in the faces of the enemies, threatning to fling it among the midft of them, unless his fouldiers made the better hafte to follow him, and fettle themselves to fight. He was a goodly tall and personable man of body. his brave armor befides fer him out and beautified his person: and withall, the advancing of his enfigu on high, drew every mans eye upon him as well enemies as friends. But when he was anproached once to the banners of the Spaniards, then from all hands they spared him not, but lanced at him their barbed javelins, and the whole bartell in manner was bent only against him. But meither the multitude of enemies, nor the volley of their shot, was able to repreis and rebut the I violence of that one man Likewise M. Artilius a Lieutenant, caused the ention beater of the first band of the Principes, belonging to the same Legion, to enter with his ensign upon the cohortand troop of the Spaniards. The Lieutenants also L. Porcius Licinius and T. Popilius, who had the guarding of the camp, fought valiantly upon the rampier in defence thereof, and killed the Elebhants upon the very counterfearp, as they were passing over and entring the camp. And by occaison that their bodies filled up the ditch, the enemies had a passage made them into the camp, as it were over a causey or bridge raised of purpose to give them way: and there over the very carkafes of the Elephants, there was a cruell flaughter committed. But on the other fide of the camp, the Campans and the garrison of the Carthaginians had the repulse already: and under the very gate of Capua which openeth upon the river Vulturnus, there was another skirmish, wherethe K Romans friving to enter the town, were not to much put back and withflood by force of aimed men, as by brakes, scorpions, and other engins of ordnance, which being mounted and planted upon the very gate, discharged shot so violently, that they drave the enemies farther off. Over and besides the forcible and surious affault of the Romans was danted and suppressed, by reasonthat their General himself, Ap, Claudius, was hurt; who as he was encouraging his men to fight in the very forefront of the vangard, hapned to be wounded with a dart above in his breft under the left Thoulder: yet there were an exceeding number of enemies there flain before thegate, and the rest were driven for fear to make haste and get the City over their heads. Annibal also perceiving the Cohort of the Spaniards lying along dead, and the camp of the enemies so manfully defended even to the death : gave overfartheraffan't, and began to retire his enfigns, and to turn backward L all hisfootmen, interpoling his horsemen behind them, for fear the enemy should charge them on the tail. The legions were exceeding eager to purine after the enemies: but Flacche commanded to found the retreat, supposing they had done well enough already, and effected two things, to wit, that both the Campans law in how little flead Annibal ferved them; and also Annibal Affinitely knew and perceived no lefs. Some writers that have recorded this battell, fet down that of Annihal his Army there were flain that day eight thousand men, and of Campans three thou-Tand: that the Carthaginians loft fifteen enfigns, and the Campans eighteen. But in others, Tfind that the conflict was not so great, and that the fright was much more than the skirmin: for when as the Numidians and Spaniards together with the Elephants brake at unawares into The Roman Camp, those Elephants as they passed through the midst thereof, overthrew and M daild along many of the tents and pavilions; and the Sumpter-horfes and other beafts there for carriage, with great noise brake their halters, and collars, fled for fear, and bare downall afore them as they went. And that befides this tumultuous fright and confusion, Annibal dealt fratidulently, by lending in among the rest certain that could speak the Latinetongue (lot some frich he had about him) who in the Confuls namegave commandment (fince that the Camp was loft I that every fouldier should make shift for himself, and slie to the next mountains. But this deceir was foon elpied and prevented with the loss and flaughter of a number of effemies: and the Elephants were courfed out of the Camp with fire. But how loever this battell was either begun or ended, the last it was fought there, before that Capua was yielded up and

The Mediaffirmions (for fo they call the head Magistrate and Governor of the City of Capua) for that year, was one Seppins Lefins, a man of base parentage and mean calling. The report goeth, that his mother upon a time as the made latisfaction in the name of him (being then fatherles and under age) by a purgatory facrifice, for a prodigious domestical portent, that hapned in her house, was told by the Soothfaier out of his learning, that one day the chief government of Coppa frionld befall to that child: whereat, fine feeing no likelihood nor hope at all of any fuch matter, fald thus again, You talk of a poor City of Capua, when that day comes; and God lave all, when my for thall be advanced to the highest place and government thereof. But these words poken at random and in jeft, proved afterwards good earnest, and true indeed. For when as the Citizens were driven to great straights, through sword and famine, and were past all hope of recovery : in O fuch fort, as they that were of quality and born for honour, refused to be implace of authority, this Leftus complaining that Capus was forlorn, betraid, and abandoned by her own nobility took inpon him the chief Magistracy, and was the last of all the Campans that bare soveraign rule in

Annibat perceiving that neither his enemies would be drawn forth any more to fight: nor pol-Ribly he could break through their camp for to come unto Capua: for lear left that the new Confuls should stop all the passages, and intercept his purveyance of victuals, determined to dislodge

A without effecting his purpole, and to remove from Capaa. And as he cast and tossed to and fro in his mind what courte to take, and whither to go; it came into his head to make no more ado, but to march directly to Rome, the very head and feat-City of the whole war. This was the upfhot of all, and the emprese that he most desired. Howbeit as all others much grieved and greatly blamed him, that he had over-flipt the opportunity when it was, even prefently upon the battell at Canne: so himself acknowledged no less that he was mightily overteen. And yet the thing was not so far paft (he thought) that he should despair, but upon tome sudden tright and unexpected tumult, he might seize of some quarter of the City or other, And if Rome were once in that hazard, then either both the Roman Generals, or one at the leaft, would immediatly leave the fiege of Capus. B Who if they had once divided their forces, both of them would be the weaker, and minister either unto him or to the Campans, some occasion of good for tune. The only thirg that troubled his mind was this, for fear left that as foon as his back were turned, the Campans would yield themselves unto the Romans. He therefore with large and liberall rewards induceth a certain Numidian(an audacious and adventurous fellow, one that cared not what dangers he undertook) to be the carrier of certain letters, and to enter into the camp of the Romans, counterfeiting himfelf to be a fugitive, from the adverte part unto them: and fo when he espied his time to slip secretly from the other fide of the camp to Capza. The letters were very comfortable, importing unio them, "That his remove and departure from thence was for their good and fafety, whereby he "meant to withdraw the Roman Captains and their forces from Capua to the defence of their C "own City of Rome: willing them not to let fall their hearts and be discouraged; for by patient "abiding some sew daies they should be wholly freed and delivered of the siege. Then he made flay of all the shipping and vessels that he could find upon the river Vulturnus, and commanded them to be brought to Castlinum, which he had fortified aforetime with a pile or Castle to guard and keep the place with a garrison. And having intelligence that there was such flore of barges and bottoms upon the river, as would serve to transport in one night his whole army: he made provision of victuals for ten daies, brought down his army by night to the river side, and crossed the water with all his power before the next day-light, But this was not carried fo fecretly but before that it was effected, intelligence was given thereof by certain runnagate ingitives: whereupon Fulvius Flaccus addressed his letters unto the Senate of Rome, and gave notice thereof. At D which tidings men according to their fundry fannes and humours were diverfly affected: and as

fo fearfull an occurrence required, incontinently the Senate attembled. P.Cornelius, surnamed Asira, was of opinion, that all the Captains and Armies whatsoever should be called home out of all parts of Italy, without regard of Capua or any other exploit befides, lave only the defence of the City. Fabius Maximus thought it was a dishonest, lewd, and a shamefull part to depart from the siege of Capua, and to be scared to turn here and there, and to be carried away with every copy of Annibal his countenance, and with his vain threats and menaces. He that won a victory at Canna, and durft not then go forward to the City, hath he conceived any hope now to win Rome, being also lately repulsed from Capua? No, he marcheth toward Rome, not minding to befiege it, but hoping to raile the fiege from Capua. And however it Ebe, I am affured (quoth he) that Jupiter (the witness of covenants broken by Annibal) and other gods besides, will deemd us with the help of that army which we shall find at home in the City, Between these two opinions P. Valerius Flacens held the mean, and prevailed: for he having a regard and due confideration, both of the one and the other; thought good to write unto the Colonels that lay before Capua, and to certifie them what strength they had of able men to defend the City: as for the forces of Annibal, and what power was needfull to maintain the fiege at Capra, they themselves knew best. Therefore in case that one of the Pro-Consist there, and part of the army might be spared from thence and sent to Rome, and nevertheless, the siege conti-Due with the conduct of the other Pro-Conful, and the rest of the army: then Claudius and Fulwiss should so order the matter between themselves, that the one of them might remain still be-Flore Capua at fiege, and the other repair to Rome, for to defend and keep their native country from the same danger. Hereupon the Senate agreed, and made an Act : which being brought unto Capna, Q. Falvina the vice-Conful who was to go to Rome, by reason that his Collegue was sick of his hurt, chose out of the three armies certain companies of souldiers, and so with fireen thousand footmen, and one thousand horsemen, passed over the river Vulturnus. Then having certain intelligence, that Annibal minded to march along the Latine freet way: he took his journey, through the towns and burroughs fituate upon the way Appia, and fent his courriers before unto Seria, Sorajand Lavinium, which are feated near unto it, not only for to lay provision of victuals ready for him in their Cities and towns, but also from the country villages farther out of the way, to bring their provision to that port through-fare: and to draw forces into their towns for their own defeuce, and every one to fland upon their good guard, and to look unto their flate, as well publike

Annibal the same day that he had croffed Val. ar nur encamped not far from the river. And the morrow after entred into the territory of the Sidicins, and led his host near unto Cales. There, after he had staid one day, forraging and spoiling the country, he marched by Sueffula, into the territories of Alifu and Cassum, by the way of the Latine street. Under the town Cassum he abode in camp two daies, and raised booties here and there in every place. From theme leaving Interrantes and Aquinum, he came into the country about Fregella, as far as to the river Live where he found the bridge cut down by the Fregellans for to impeach and let his journey, Faloi-H selikewile was staid at the river Vulturnus, by reason that the barges and bottoms were burnt by Annibal: and much ado he had, for the great scarcity of timber and wood, to make punts and bouts for to fet over his army. But Fulvius, after he had once transported his men in such boats and planks as he made shift withall, had afterwards no hindrance in his journey; but found nor only ftore of victuals in the Towns and Cities as he travelled, but also plenty thereof brought ready for him to the waies fide right curteoully. Then the fouldiers as they marched on foor cheered and encouraged one another to mend their pace and make speed, considering they went to the defence of their naturall country. Now there was a post fent from Fregella, who rode night and day and never made stay, and he put the City inexceeding sear. The running together t belides of the people, that ceased not to make every thing more than it was, and to inventiomewhat of their own fingers ends, and put it to the news that they heard, made a greater hurry than the messenger himself, and set the City in an uprore. And not only the women were heard to weep and wail in their own private houses: but also from all parts the Dames of the City came flocking into the streets, running about to all the Churches and Chappels of their gods and goddeffes, sweeping the Alters with the treffes of their hair hanging down, kneeling upon the bare ground and firetching out their hands up toward heaven unto the gods, pouring out their pravers and supplications. That they would vouchfale to preserve the City of Rome out of the hands of the enemies, and to fave the Roman wives and their little children from harm and all abuse. The body of the Senat gave attendance upon the Magistrates in the common place, ready to give K them their advice and counfell. Some receive of them direction, and departed every man to execute his charge: others offer themselves to the Magistrates, to be employed in any service whatfoever, Sundry guards were befrowed in the Cattle, in the Capitoll, and upon the walls : all places about the City were well manned. The Alban mountain also and the Castle of Tusculum were surnished with good garrisons. Amidst this alarm tidings came, that Q. Fulvius the Pro-Conful, was departed from Capua, and onward on his journey to Rome with an army. And because he should not be abridged of his power and authority, after he was come into the City, there was a decree granted out of the Senat-House, that Q. Fulvius should have as large a commission of rule and command as the Confuls themselves. Annibal, after he had made souler work and havock in the territory of Fregella, than in other places, for anger that they had cut down the bridges a- L gainst his coming, led his army through the Frusinat, Ferentinat, and Anagmine countries, and came forwards into the territory Lavicos: and to by Algidum he marched toward Tulculum. And when he could not be let in there within the walls, he descended beneath Tusculum, on the right handto Gab is from whence he conducted his army into Pupinia, and eight miles from Rome encamped. The nearer the enemy approached to the City, the greater flaughter was made of the pealants that fled from him, by his vancurriers, the Numidian light-horsemen whomhe fent afore to make riddance. And many there were of all conditions and ages that were taken

In this tumultuous trouble, Fulvius Flaceus with his army entred Rome at the gate Capena: from whence he went through the midft of the City, along the fireet Carina into the Enquilia, M and from thence he went forth, and between the gates Exquilina and Collina pitched his tents. Thicher the Ædiles of the Commons brought victuals: the Conful and the Senate reforced to him into the camp, where they fate in Council about the State of the Common-weal, And agreed it was, That the Con'uls should lie encamped likewise about the gates Collina and Exquilina: that C.Calpurnim, Prator of the City, should have the keeping of the Capitoll and the Catle with a guard, and that the Senators keep refidence continually in good number within the compals of the Forum, what need foever there should be of their counsell and advice, against all fudden accidents. By this time Annibal was come forward as far as to the river. Anio, and wathin three miles of the City lay encamped, where he kept a standing Leaguer. But himself in person with 2000 horsemen advanced forward toward the gate Collina, even as far as to Hercules his N Temple, and rode all about as near as he well could, to view the walls, and the fituation of the City. Flaceus took foul disdain thereat, and thought it a shamefull indignity, that he should brave it at his pleasure to scornfully without revenge, whereupon he sent out certain of his own Cavalry, and gave commandment, That they should fet the enemies horiemen farther off, and chase them back into their Camp. Whiles they were in skirmish together, the Consuls gave order, that the Numidian horsemen, such as were fled from the enemy, and turned to me Romans (who were at that time to the number of twelve hundred upon the Aventine hill) frould pals through the midft of the City to the Exquilie : supposing that there were none more meet than they, for to fight among the valleys, the garden houses, the sepulchres and hollow waies on every fide. Whom, when some from the Castle and the Capitoll, espied riding down the O descent of the hill, called Clivus Puplius, they ran crying about the City, The Aventine istaken, The Aventine is taken, Which alarm canted a sumult, and gave such an occasion of feat, and nunning away, that if the Camp of Annibal had not been without the walls, the fearfull multirude doubtless would have abandoned and quit the City. But they took their houses, and got every man up to the tetraffes and leads thereof: from whence they pelted with flones and other flor, their own friends inflead of enemies, as they rode feattering one from another in the firette This tumule could not be repressed, nor the error appear, by reason that the waies were so petered

A with a number of the country peafants, and of cattell befides, whom sudden fear had driven into the City. Howbeit, the horsemen fought fortunately, and the enemies were removed and fer back. And because it was necessary to say all disorders and uprores that chanced upon small occasions to arise, it was thought good and agreed upon, that all those who had been either Dickators, or born the office of Centors, should have their full power and authority, untill such time as the enemy was clean departed from about the walls, and that was to good purpose: for all the rest of that dry, and the night following, there were divers and sundrygarboiles, without any cause or occation raised, and the lame shiled and appealed by that means.

The next day. Annibal passed over Anio, and brought forth all his whole power into the field. B Neither were Flacens and the Consuls behind hand for their parts, but ready for battell. When both armies stood arranged in order on both sides, amuled upon the issue and event of that one fight, which was for no less a prize and reward to the victorious part, than the very City of Rome; there fell such a mighty storm of rain and hail together, and so troubled both boths, that they could scarce hold their weapons in hand, but were driven to retire themselves for safety into their severall Camps, searing nothing less than their own enemies. The morrow after likewise, when they slood in the same place in battell array, the likecempest parted them as under. And they were not so soon retired into their Camp, but the day was wonderful sair, and the weather calmagain.

The Carthaginians took this for an ominous prefage to them of illluck. And Annil al was Cheard (by report) to fay, That one while his mind, another while his fortune, would not give him leave to win the City of Rome. There were other occurrences befides, as well final is agreat that discouraged him and abated his hope. Of more importance was this, that whiles helay with his host in arms before the walls of Rome, he understood, there were certain companies with banners displaied sent into Spain for to supply the armies there, Of lefs reckoning was this, that he was advertised by a certain captive, how the very same plot of ground whereon he was en amped, hapned at the same time to be fold: not understoot, but at the full price, and nothing abated. This he took to be so presumptuous a part, and such a scornfull indignity, namely, that there should be a chapman found at Rome, to make purchase of that piece of land, which he was possested on held in right of arms, that presently he called for the publike crier and trumpet, and gave com-

D mandment unto him, to proclaim port-fale of all the fhops of Bankers and money changers at that time about the Forum in Rame. Neverthelefs, hereupon he was moved to diflodge and retired his camp backwards from the City to the river Turin, fix miles from Rome. From whence he took his way to the grove of Forum, where flood a Temple, in those daise much renowned for wealth and riches. The inhabitants thereabout were certain Capenats, who used to bring thither the first fruits of their corn and revenues, yea, and many other oblations besides, according to their store; by means whereof they had adorned and garmified it with much gold and silver. Of all those gitts and offerings was this Temple then robbed and spoiled. But after the departure of Anmbalstom thence there were found great heaps of brash, by reason that the souldiers upontouch and remorse of conscience, had cast in many brazenpieces. The facking and pillage of this Temple.

Eall writers do agree upon, and make no doubt thereof. Calina faith, That Annibal as he went to-ward Rome from Eretum, turned thither, and he fetteth down the beginning of his journey from Reace Curil a, and from Amiternum. And that out of Campania, he came into Sammium, and from thence into the country of Pelipniand to passed beside whe City Susmo, to the Marcins, and then by the territory of the Albenses into the Marsinas land, and from thence he marched to Amiternum, and to forward to the town Forus. Neither is there any errour or doubt in all this, because the marks and tokens of the voyage of fo great an army could not within the memory and compals of fo small an age be consounded and worn out. For certain it is, that he passed that way. The only difference lieth herein, whether he came to the City of Rome, or returned from thence into Campania, by that way aforefaid.

F Now was not Annibal to resolute to defend Capua, but the Romans were as fully bent, and more eager to continue the fiege and assault thereof. For he sped himself so fast another way in his voyage back, first out of the Lucans country to the Brutians, and so on still to the streight of Sicily] and to Rhegium, that with his sudden coming thither, he surprised them at unawares, even before they heard of his arrivall, As for Capua, albeit in the time of Fulvius his ablence it was no leis straightly beleagured, yet it felt the coming again of Flacens: and besides, there was much marvell there, why Annibal returned not back as well as he. Afterwards, they understood, by conference with some that were without, how they were for laken and for lorn of Anmbal, and that the Carthaginians were past all hope to keep and hold Capua still to their own use. There was an Edict moreover of the Pro-Conful, passed by order from the Senat, and the same publithed and divulged among the enemies, That what Citizen foever of Capua would turn to the GRomans before such a certain day he should have a generall pardon. But there was no coming in, nor ranging to the Romans fide; for fear of punishment at the Romans hands, more than for any regard of their allegiance to the Carthaginians: because their transgettion and trefpals in their former revolt was fo great, that it might not be abandoned. And as no one man at all privatly on his own head came over to the camp of the Romans, so there was no good order taken by publike councill for the benefit and fafety of the whole City. The Noblemen had given over managing of state-matters, and could not be brought by any means to assemble in the Senat.

And in chief place of government was he, who had not won to himfelf any honour thereby, but H his unworthings was derogatory to the anchority and power of that Magiliracy which he bare For now there was not one of the chief Civizens and Noblemen that would be fo much as feen in the Market place or Common Hall of affemblies: but shutting themselves within doors in their privat houses, they expected every day for the destruction of their country, together with their own undoing and overthrow. The whole charge and care lay upon Boft ar and Hanno Captains of the garrison in the fort there of the Carthaginians, and more carefull were they of their own welfare, than fearfull for the jeopardy of their triends and Allies, Thefe two wrote letters unto Annibil, endited not only in plain terms and frankly, but also sharply and bitterly: wherein they hid unto his charge, "That he had not only betraied Capua into the hands of the enemies, but also I "delivered and exposed them and the garrison to the cruell clutches of the Romans to be massa-"cred and executed. That he was gone his waies, and departed into the country of the Brutii, as one that turned away his face of purpose because he would not see with his own eyes the loss Got Capaa, But, I wot, the Romans contratiwite could not be withdrawn from the fiege of Ca-" pua, no, not by the affaulting of the City of Rome: fo much more were the Romans resolute "enemies, than the Carthaginians confrant friends. But if he would return again to Capua, and "bend the full force of his war thither, both they and the Citizens also of Capua would be ready "to fally forth and encounter the enemies. For why, they passed not over the Alps with intentto "war with the Rhegins and Tarentins; no but where the Roman Legions were, there ought the "armies of the Carthaginians to be. Thus at Canna, thus at Thrasymenus were the victories at- W "chieved, by affronting and meeting the enemy, by joyning camp to camp, and by hazarding the "fortune of the battell. To this effect were the letters penned, and given to certain Numidians; who for a good reward had offered their service before, for the lafe carriage and deliveryof them. These tellows presented themselves before Flacers in the Camp, in habit and quality offugitives unto his fide:hoping to fpy out some convenient time when they might give nim theslip and be gone. Now by occasion of the famine which had continued long in Capna there was none but might pretend a good and reasonable cause to depart from thence to the adverse part. But behold, there hapned a Capuan wench to come into the leaguer (a naughty-pack and an harlor, that one of the supposed counterfeit sugitives aforelaid kept.) he enformed the Generall of the Romans, that those Numidians, fraudulently and by covin pretended to flie unto his past and had L letters about them unto Annibal. This would fine stand to, and be ready to aver to the very face of one of them, who bewrayed & disclosed the plot unto her. At littly when he was brought for littlefore her, he fet a jolly countenance of the matter & made it very strange & pretending stoutly that he knew not the woman; but by little and little he was convicted by manifest truths, and enecially, when he saw that they called for the rack, and that he was upon the point to be put to torture : and to in the end confessed that all was true, and therewith brought forth the letters. Over and befides, another thing was now revealed, which before was kept close and fecter; to withat there were other Numidians belides, who under the colour of fugitives had gone up and down in the Roman camp a of these there were apprehended not so few as threescore and ten, and they rogether with the new were whipped with rods, had their hands cut off, and fent back again to M Capua. This pitious spectacle and fight of so searfull execution killed their courige, and brake the very heart of the Campans, Whereupon the people ran together unto the Council House, and compelled Lesius to attemble a Senat, and openly threatned the Nobles (who a long time had abfensed themselves from publike consultations) that unless they would now repair into the Senas, they would go home to their very houses, and pluck them out by the ears into the street. Forfear bereof the chief Magistrate had a frequent and full assembly of Senators. Whiles all the reffwere of opinion to fend Embassadors to the Roman Generals, Vibius Virius (who had beenthechief cause and principall author of their first revolt from the Romans) being demanded his advice, fpake to the point in this manner.

"They that talk of Embaffadors of peace, and of yielding, little confider and remembereither N of Vibius Viri- "what they would have done in case the Romans had been at their devotion and mercy, or what in the Senat & themselves must endure and suffer. For what think ye will become (quoth he) of this present sur-Frender of ours, in comparison of that whereby in times past we freely gave unto the Romans " our felves, and all that we had, for to obtain their aid and fuccour against the Samnits? This Oration of Virins, there were more men present that heard with applause and good li-

The greater part of the Senat, not despairing, but that the clemency of the people of Rome, which had been tried and seen oftentimes in many wars, might be gained and extended also unto them; concluded, to fend Embassadors with commission to yield Copus into the Romans & hands. Some leven and twenty Senators there were that accompanied Vibius Virius home to Phin Virius his house, and supped with him: and after they had done what they could to drink themselves and divers Se. drunk, and to intoxicate their brains with freely taking in their wine (thereby to withdraw their minds from the fence and apprehension of their imminent harm and mifery) drunk all of the purpose of the provinced cure showeful. Now, by reason that their veins were filled with full feeding and drinking wine to liberally, the poyton was not to quick of operation, nor to effectuall as to haften their death. And therefore most of them languished all night long yea, and continued drawing on a piece of the next day, before they let their fast breath : but yet they all had yielded up their ghost before that the gates were fet open for the enemies.

Capua delivered to the Ro-

The day following, the gate of Jupiter which flood next over against the Roman Camp, was by the commandment of the Pro-conful opened. Thereat entred one legion and two comers of horsemen, under the leading of C. Fulvius the Lieutenant: who after he had first above all other things given express order, that all armor of defence, and weapons of offence (which was so be found in Capua) should be brought forth and presented unto him; placed and disposed at all the I gates, warders fufficient to fee that no person might possibly go forth, or be let out: then he laid hold upon the garrison of the Carthaginians, and commanded the Senators of Capua to repair into the Camp, before the Roman Captain Generals themselves, So foon as they were thither come ftraightwaies they had irons clapped upon them, and were commanded to make tender unto the treaturers of all the gold and filver they had. The gold amounted to 70 pound weight: the filver rose to the weight of three thou and and two hundred pound. Five and twenty of the Senators were sent to Cales, eight and twenty to Theanum, to be kept sale in ward. Even those who were known for certain to have principally moved and periwaded the tevole from the Romans. Concerning the punishment of the Senators of Capua, Fulvius, and Claudius con.d not agree, Cliudus was more tractable and exorable, and might have been foon entreated for a pardon. Fulumewas K more rigorous, and proceeded to a harder course. Whereupon Appear pur over the whole deciding and determination thereof unto the Senate of Rome. Alledging, that it was meet and requifite, that the LL, of the Councill should have the examination of the cause, and namely, spon these points. Imprimis, whether they had complotted and combined in this action, with any of the free burroughs and Cities belonging to the state of the Latines. Item, whether they had any help and relief from thence in the time of the war, or from any other towns what loever? But Eulouss in no case would condescend thereto, nor suffer that the minds of faithfull and loyall allies should be disquieted with doubtfull surmites and suspitions of any ctimes; and called in question upon the appeachment and delatory information of those that never yet made reckoning or conscience, either what they did, or what they faid. And therefore he protested to suppress that manner of I proceeding, and crush that inquisition for ever. After this communication they departed annules: and Appins made no doubt but that howfoever his Collegue fared and took on giving out fo shrewd and bitter words, he would yet take paule and flay for the letters from Rome, concerning fo weighty a bufinels as this was. But Fulvius, because of his designment, brake up his keeping of ftate in his royall pavilion, and fent his officers and ordinary train out of the way, because be would not be hindred and empeached by them, in the course of his designment; and commanded the Colonels and Captains of the Allies to give warning unto two thousand chosen men of arms, for to be in readiness and present themselves at a third sound of the trumper. With this power of horsemen he sectorward by night, and matched to Theanum: and by break of day entredibe gate and kept his way on into the market-place. At the first entrance of the horsemen, the peo-M ble ran together from all parts: then he caused the chief Magistrate (a Sidicin) to be called, and charged him to produce his prisoners the Capuans, whom he had in cultody. When they were all brought forth, they were first whipped with rods, and then beheaded. From thence he rode upon the spur to Cales: where so soon as he was set on the Tribunal seat, in place of judgement, and the Capuan prifoners likewife prefented in place and bound to the stake; there came a horseman in post from Rome, and when he had delivered letters from C. Calphurnius the Conful, and the people of Rome unto Fulenus; there ran a rumour from the Tribunal through all the assembly, that the whole process against the Campans was to be put off and reserved entire to the centure and doom of the Lords of the Senate. And Falving supposing it to be no less indeed, after he took the letters, never brakethem up, but hestowed them in his bosome, and gave com-N mandment to the Criet, to charge the Lictor or executioner to do his office, according to law. Thus they also that were at Cales were executed and inffered death. Then he read the latters and the order fet down by the Senate: but it was too late now, to flay that which was done stready and past and which indeed was hastened with all speed that might be, for fear it might have been Now as Fulvius was arising from the bench, Taurea Jubellius, a Campan, passing amids the croffed and prevented.

with that, he drew forth the skein which he had hid under his garment, and stabbed himself in Jubillina ka. the breft quite through his body, and there at the feet of the L. For asmuch as both the execution of the Campans, and also the most part of other marters were performed according to the will of Flacens alone: fome there be that write how Apple us Claudius died about the time that Capua was yielded. And that this very fame Taurea neither came to Cales of his own accord, nor killed himself: but that as he was a binding to the stake, because the words which he uttered could not be heard for the consused noise of the people therefore Flacour commanded filence, and then Taurea spake those words before rehearled, namely, That himself a right valiant and hardy man was put to death by a meaner person than himself. and much inferior to him in valour and vertue, Whereat by the commandment of the Pro-Con-

B ful the crier pronounced and faid: Go to Serjeant, let this brave and valiant man have the more ftore of rods bestowed upon him, let him have good scourging, lay on load, and set the lashes surely on, and let him he the first that you proceed against, let him have the law to the full, Some there be that have written, how the act of the Senat was read before he proceeded to the beheading but because there was this branch or clause within the act. That ithe thought so good he should referve the whole deciding of the matter unto the Senat : he confirmed it thus, that it was put to his difcretion for to weigh and confider what was more profitable to the Common-weal. This done, he returned from Cales to Capua. Atella and Calaria were both forrendred into his hands; where they also who were the chief heads of those states suffered the like punishment. Thus there were about fourfcore of the Senators put to death; and to the number well-near of three hundred C Capuans (born of noble blond) committed to prison. Others of them were bestowed in safe sustody within divers Cities of the Latines, and came to fundry unhappy ends. The multitude befides of the Campan Citizens were fold outright.

It remained now to put to question and debate, what was to be done with the City and the Territory thereto belonging And some were of mind, that a City so exceeding mighty, so near a neighbour, and so dangerous to Rome, should be utterly rased and destroyed. But the consideration of a present commodity and gain took place and prevailed. For in regard of the retritory and land lying about it (which was well known to be the most fertile toil in all Italy, and yielded all manner of fruit) the City was faved : whereinto those husbandmen that tilled the grounds might. retire themselves and dwell. And for the peopling and inhabiting thereof, there was a multitude n referred of the Inhabitants which were there already, namely of Libertines and enfran hifed bondslaves, Merchants factors, retailers, artizans, and craftimen who kept there still and remain ned. But the whole territory, and all publike edifices were feized to the use of the people of Rome. Moreover, order was taken, that Capna should be inhabited only, and replenished with people like a City: but no form of Common-weal, no Corporation, no Senat, no affembly of Commons, nor Magiltrate of their own should be allowed there. For without a common Council of State, without magistracy and government, without intelligences and reciprocall commerce, as in the body of a Commonalty, they supposed, that they would never agree together in any complete, but be far unmeet to contrive a conspiracy and compass alteration. As for a Provost or Governonce minister law, and execute justice among them, they purposed to fend them one yearly from Rome,

E Thus were the affairs ordered and composed at Capua by a good policy and commendable course every way. For those that were most in fault and guilty were punished with rigour, and that freedily. The number of Cirizens were feattered and dispersed fundry waies, without all hope to return again. The bare houses and walls that had not offended they were spared, and neither burned nor pulled down. And befides, the commodity and gain that accrewed unto the Romans by this manner of proceeding, they won some name of clemency and mercy among their Confederates and Allies in that they faved a most noble and weakhy Lity, at the roins where of all Campane, and as many States asbordered about Campane, would have grieved much, and groaned again. By this means also the enemy was constrained now to confeis, and could not acherwise chule, how powerful and mighty the Romans were to chastise and punish their faithless affociats, F yea, and how feeble Annibal was, and not able to defend and maintain those whom he had received into his protection. The Roman Pro-Confuls after they had finished and performed their charge at & saus affigued unto Claudius Nero fix thouland footmen out of thole two Legions which he had rote Caput. and three hundred horsemen which he had chosen himself: also of Latine Allies as many foot in number, and 800 horse besides. This army Nero embarked at Putedi, and transported into Spain. When he was arrived at Tayacon, after he had there landed his fouldiers, and laid up his ships in dock and armed with all his mariners (to make the greater number) he marched to the river Iberis, where he received the forces of T. Fomeius, and L. Martius, and from thence advanced roward the enemies.

G Afdrabal the fon of Amilcar lay encamped at a place called the Black-flones, in the Anterene country: it lieth between the towns Illitargis and Mentiffs. Now News kept the narrow diseights of the forrest there. Afdrabal, because he would not be pent up in so streight a room, sent an heraid or messenger of peace to him, who should make promise in his name, that if Nero would permit him to pais peaceably from thence, he would withdraw all his forces out of spain. The Roman Captein took this mellage joyfully: and Afdrabal requested, That they might empail the next day, and devile together how the Romans would fee down conditions and articles in writing, as touching the rendry and delivery of the fortrefles in every City, and likewise of prefix- H ing fome day, by which time the garritons should be removed and displaced, and the Carthaeimans have away all their bag and baggage without fraud and covin. Afdrubal having obtained his request, presently commanded, that in the very evening, and all night long the heaviest and most cumbersome part of his whole army should escape what way soever they could out of the sullet of the forrest. But he gave especiall direction, that they should not over many of them that night go forth, because their small number was not only fitter to deceive the enemy, and not so soon to be discovered, but also might more easily pals through those narrow and difficult passages. So the morrow they came to an enterview and parl; where the time was frent of purpole in much needless talk, and drawing of books, more than cause was: whereupon the day being far gone, the businels was put off unto the next day, And the night ensuing between mi. I nifted Aldrubal more time to fend others away. And yet could not they make an end that day neither. Thus there passed certain daies, emploied in open shew about dispute and reasoning of the articles and conditions of agreement, and the nights were bestowed in letting out the Carthaginians closely out of their Camp. Now, after that the greater part of his hoft was gone away clear, then he began to wrangle and jar, yea, and to go from some offers that he had voluntarily made, and ever they were further and further off from agreement. For Astrobal the less that he feared, the less allo was to be trusted. And by this time in manner all his Infantry were got out of the forrest, and the next morning, not only the forrest, but all the plains about were overcast, and covered with a thick and foggy mist. Which Afdrubal perceiving, he sent a messenger to Nero, requesting to deser their farther conference and communication to the K morrow: pretending, that the present day was a festivall holy-day among the Carthaginians. and therefore they made (cruple upon it, to tollow any other business but serve God, All this while there was no fraud so much as once inspected. As drubal had no sooner obtained respite for that day, but forthwith he and all his Cavalry, together with his Elephants, dislodged, and without any noise or stirrecovered without any harm a place of security. By the sourth hour of the day the sun had dispatched and scattered the mitt, and cleared the sky, and then the Romans might discover the Camp of their enemies empty, and no creature left therein. Then at length, Claudius perceiving that Aldrabal had shewed him a Carthaginian trick, and that he was at length thus over-raught by his falshood and cunning practice, began to make out after him, minding to bid him battell. But the enemy would none of that, and fell off. Howbeit there passed some L small skirmishes between the rereward of the Carthaginians, and the forlorn hope and vantcourtiers of the Romans. Amidêt these affairs (the States of Spain) neither they who revoked after the overthrow of the Romans, returned again unto them; nor any new fell away, more than before.

At Rome; the Senate and people after the recovery of Capua, took as great care for Spain now, as for Italy it felf. And agreed they were in generall, that the army there should be threngthed with newforces, and a Generall thither fent: but who should be theman was not yet concluded. Forafmuch as they were to take some extraordinary care in the chusing of one to be sent thither, where two fingular and renowned warriors were flain within the compais of thirty daies, and to forceed in the room of tholerwain. Whiles some nominated one, and some another, at length M they grew to this point; that the people should hold a folemn assembly (as it were, purchased) for election of a Pro-Conful to go over into Spain. And the Confuls accordingly proclaimed a fer day for the faid affembly. At first there was great expectation that those persons who took themselves worthy of so great command should put forth themselves, and prefer their own names beforehand, But when this expectation failed and came to nothing, every man began afteln to retricate and renew the former grief, and mourn again for the loffes received, and to find the want and missof so valorous Captains whom they had lost. Whereupon the whole City being fad and pensive, and in manner destitute of all good counsell, and not resolved what to do in this hard case, came yet down into Mars field upon the day appointed for the election. Every mans eye was upon the Magiltrates, and beheld the countenances of their great men and Ru-N lers, how they looked one upon another, grieving and grumbling, that the State was at follow an ebb, and the Common-weal grown to io desperate a case, that no man durst be seen to take upon him the government and Province of Spain. Then all of a fudden, P. Cornelius (his fon that was flain in Spain, a young Gentleman, not fully four and twenty years old) shewed himfelf- and faid, That he would undertake that charge upon him: and therewith stepped up into an higher place, from whence he might be feen, and there he flood, Upon whom, when all men had taft their eyes, and viewed him well, in a general accord and favourable affection unto the man, they wished unto him straightwaies a happy and fortunate government. And when the assembly was willed to give their suffrages, and go to a scrutiny, there was not one Century from the first to the lift, nor one perion from the highest to the lowest, but gave their voice with P. Sci-O pio, for to take a voyage as L. Deputy into Spain. But after the thing was passed, and their passionate heat of affection once allaied, they were on a sudden driven into a still silence and deep dump, to think what a strange and new deed shey had done. And that which they bethought themselves most of, was this, that savour had carried them away in this action more than the due confideration and regard of his age. Some there were that had in dread and horror the omimous fortune also of that family; and the name of him that out of two mournfull houses was to

A go into those Provinces where he must fight amongst the Sepulchres both of father and uncle.
When Scipio per ceived, that presently upon the election passed in so hady a fir, the people grew to be heavy and pensive; he called them to an open audience, and there before them all discounsed of his young age, of the government committed unto him, and of the future war that he was to manage: and that with so noble courage and hauty spirit, that he renewed afresh and kindled again the former zeal and heat that was so cooled: and possessed mens minds with more assured hope than ulually mans faithfull promise, or reason grounded upon the considence of precedents path, or any earthly thing is wont to afford and warrant, For Scipio was a rare and wonderfull man, not only in regard of those true vertues inherent in him but also for that he had framed B himself even from his young and tender years, by artificiall means, to the better setting out of those inbred parts and qualities of his own: making shew and femblant before the multitude. that the most things which he did, were either represented unto him by night-visions and apparitions, or else suggested, as it were, by revelation from the gods above; were it that he was superstitionsly given, and his mind wholly possessed therewith, or that by his policy he might effect his designments, and have his commandments performed with more expedition, as if they were directions delivered from the Oracles and the very mouth of the gods. Over and besides that, he made this overture to credit and reputation, and prepared mens minds in this fort from his very first beginning. From the very time that he once put on his mans gown, there was no day went over his head, but before he began his own private business, or enterprised any publike affairs, he C would go into the Capitoll: and so soon as he was entred into the Temple, there sit him down. and alone by himself bestow a good time in some secret Ile and corner thereof. This ordinary manner of his, which he continued all his life long, (were it of purpole consideratly, or by chance unadvisedly) made divers men beleeve verily, that it was a truth indeed, which was commonly supposed and reported, That the man had a god to his father. Which deep and setled imagination of the people, resembled and renewed again the like same (in all the world) to that which went before and was bruited abroad of Alexander the great, and for the vanity and fabulous speech of folk, was the very same and all one in every respect: namely, that his mother conceived him by a mighty great serpent: for that very often in her bed-chamber there was seen some such prodigious and wonderfull thing, and ever as any body came in, it would wind away of a fudden, and vanish out of fight. These strange and miraculous conceits he would never himself elevate and discredit as roies and vanities, but rather cherifh and encreale the opinion thereof, by a certain cunning caft of his own, in that he would neither deny and difavow any fuch matter, nor yet affirm plainly and verifie the fame. Many other devices he had of like fort, partly true indeed, partly feigned and counterfeit, which caused men beyond all measure to have this young man in wonderfull admiration. Upon the strong and grounded prefumption whereof, the City at that time conferred upon him (far unmeet, I wot, in regard of his unripe years) so great a government, and a world withall of weighty and important affairs.

Besides, the forces which remained in Seaso to the old the world had been conferred.

Befides, the forces which remained in Spain of the old army, and those which were transported over from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, he had a supplement also of ten thousand foor, and one E thousand horsemen: and to assist in the conduct of his wars, he had as coadjutor appointed unto him M. Junius Syllanus the Pro-Prator. Thus with a fleet of thirty ships, (and Galleys there were all of five banks of oars) he took the leas, and fet fail from the mouth of Tybre, and coasting along the Tuscan seas under the Alps, and through the gulph of Gallia, he doubled at length the point and cape of Pyrene, and disbarked at Emporia a City of Greeks: (for descended they are also from Phocas) and there he fer his people a land. From thence, having taken order that his ships should follow after, he marched by land to Taracon, which he appointed for the Rendar 2000 H. where all his allies and confederats (for at the wonder and fame of his landing there flocked Embaffadors unto him from all parts of the Province) should meet together at a generall Dier, There he commanded that the ships should be bestowed in their docks, fave only three Galleys F (of three ranks) which came from Massiles, and upon curtesie and kindness accompanied him from home, and those wete sent back again. Then he gave audience to the Embassadors, who hung in doubtfull suspence by reason of the variety and of sundry changes and chances that lately had hapned, and to them he began to return answer, and give them their severall dispatches: but with such a spirit and boldness (upon considence that he had in his own rare vertues) that he let not fall in all his speech one word that might move quarrell, and savoured of rigour, and yet whatsoever he spake, it carried an exceeding majesty with it, and a singular credit. Being departed from Taracon, he visited both the States of the Allies, and also the standing winting camps of the army: where he highly commended the fouldiers, for that notwithstanding they had received two shrewd blows, upon two so great deseats one in the neck of another, yet they held the Province G still, and kept the field; and not suffering the enemies to reap and taste the fruit of their fortunate victories, and kept them out of all the countries lying within Iberns, and defended faithfully all their confederats according to the trust reposed in them. Martins he had in his train alwaies about him; whom he so highly honoured, that it was very well seen, he seared nothing less than that any other man should eclipse or shadow his glory. Then Syllanus succeeded in place of Nero, and the new fouldiers were brought into the standing winter leaguers, and Scipio having reviewed all the Cities and the States that he was to survey, and performed all other affairs that were then to be done, retired and withdrew himself to Tarason

The fame of Scopic was no less bruited among the enemies, thanit was rife with his own Ci- H rizens and loving allies : and a certain plefage went withall of the future event, which carried (as good hap was) the greater fear and dread with it, as there was less reason that could be rendred and given thereof. They had betaken themselves into their wintring harbours far distant and remore alunder. Aldrubal the fon of Gilgo even as far as to the Ocean lea tide unto Gades: Mago into the midland parts, and especially above the forest and chase of Castulo. And Astrabal the son of Amilear wintred nearest unto Iberus about Saguntum.

In the very end of that summer, when Capua was won, and Scipio come into Spain, the Carthaginian Armado which was fent for out of Sicily to Tarentum, for to intercept the victuals, and empeach the same for coming to the Roman garrison that held the Caffle of Tarentum, had verily flopped all the passages from the sea to the said Castle: but by their long abode in those parts. I and keeping the leas to traightly, they had cauled a greater dearth and fearcity of victuals among their own friends than their enemies: for there could not by the help of those Carthaginian shins to much corn be along the river that was pollefled by friends, nor from the open ports, for to furnish the townsmen of Tarentum, as the navy it sell consumed and spent in maintenance of that rabble of sea-men, failers, and mariners, mingled of all sorts of people. So as the garrison of the Castle being but few in number there was able to be sustained by the provision they had aforehand, without the help of any new brought in unto them : whereas the Tarentins and the Navy could not have sufficient conveighed unto them: by reason whereof, at length the Armado had leave to depart thence with more thanks of the City, than they had for their first bren-venuthither. And yet victuals were not much cheaper, because when the help by sea was gone therecould K no corn at all be brought from other parts abroad. At the end of the very tame fummer, when M. Marcellus was come to the City out of Sicily.

his own Province, C. Calphurnius the Prætor affembled the Senat for his sake in the Temple of Bellong. Where, after he had discoursed of the acts by him atchieved, and complained after a mild and modeli fort, laying open his griefs, not fo much in the behalf of himfelf, as of his fouldiers: in that when he had performed and accomplished his charge and commission in his Province, he could not have licence to bring home his army with; he demanded that he might be allowed to ride intriumph into the City: but he could not obtain it. This matter was much canvaffed and debated, pro Cr contra, Whether it were less meet and convenient, to deny him triumph being now present, in whose name whiles he was absent, for the fortunat success and good speed of all af-L fairs under his conduct and government, there was a solemn procession decreed, and sacrifices done to the honour of the immortall gods: or to grant him triumph (as if the war werefully finished) whom the Senate had commanded to make over his army to his successor; which surely they would never have decreed, but that the war remained still within the Province : and especially feeing the army it felf was away, the best witness simply, whether he had deserved a triumbh orno. At length, a middle and indifferent course between both was agreed upon, namely that he should enter the City ovant in a perty triumph. And the Tribunes of the Commons, by the approbation first of the Senate, proposed unto the people, that M. Marcellus should the lameday that he came ovant into the City retain ftill his full authority and government. The day before he entred the City, he rode in triumph upon the mount Albanus, and from thence, in ovant wile held fent a rich booty before him into the City. There was carried in this pomp the counterfeit of the Marcellus tri-Chy Stracule won, crosbows, brakes, flanding flings, and all other warlike inftrument: befides, the ornaments tellifying long and continuall peace, and the great wealth and treasure of the Kings; as divers yeffels of filver and brais curioufly wrought; other houshold furniture alforith hangings of tapifity, and garments of great price, many goodly images and right noble flatues, wherewith Spracule was adorned and beautified, even with the bett and principal Cities of Greece, In token alio of a victory over the Carthaginians, there were eight Elephants brought in a thew. And that which was not the least fight and spectacle to behold, Sofisthe Syracusan, and Mericus the Spaniard went afore with crowns of gold upon their heads. The one of them was the guide when Syracule was entred in the night leafon: and the other betraied Nafor, and the garrifon there; N Both these were enfranchised Citizens of Rome, and had fifty acres of land a piece granted unto them for ever, Sofishad his land let out in the territory of Spracule, which either belonged to the Kings, or to the enemies of the people of Rome, and a dwelling house (chuse where he would in Spracule of all those that were seized upon by right of conquest.) As for Mericus and the Spaniards that with him fled from the enemies, and fided unto the Romans, they had affighed unto them a City to inhabit applland to occupy in Sicily, which fometime belonged to them that had revoked from the people of Rome. And order was given to M. Cornelius for to appoint them the laid City and land where over he thought good. And in the same territory there were allotted and set out > leave the adverte part and turn to the Romans. After that Marcellas was departed out of Sicily, the Navy of the Carehaginians disbarked eight thouland footmen and three thouland Numidian horsemen. Unto them revolted the Murgantine land, and Hybla, together with Magella: and other imall piles of base account, took examble by them and followed after. The Numidians with their Captain Mutiner, ranged over all Sieily, and fited the towns and villages belonging to the affociats of the people of Rome. Over and besides all this, the Roman army there, being discontented and angry, partly, for that together with their Ge-tour hundred acres of land unto Belligenes, by whole means Mericus was allured and induced to

A nerall they were not licenced to go out of the Province: and partly, for that they were forbidden and debarred, for winting in any good towns; demeaned themselves flackly and lazily in their militaryservice: in such sort, as it there had been a head to lead them, as they had a heart to move them they would have mutined and rebelled. Among these troubles and difficulties, M. Cornelithe Prator, both appealed and mirtigated the Homacks of the fouldiers, as well by comfortable words, as by rebukes and checks: and also brought under his obedience and subjection, all those Cities which had revoked Of which he according to the former act of the Senate, allotted Murgantia to the Spaniards, unto whom both a City and land to it was by order aforefaid due. Both the Confuls who had the government of the Province Apulia, feeing there was less cause offear

B and terrour now from the Carthaginians and Annibal, were commanded to cast lots between them for the Provinces of April a and Macedonia. So Macedonia befell unto Sulpitius, and he fucceeded there instead of Levinus. Fulvius was sent for home to Rome, about the election of the Consuls. And when he held the solemn affembly of the people, for the choice and creation of the Coff. The Century of the younger Citizens, which had the prerogative to give their first voice declared T. Manlius Torquatus, and P. Octacilius for Confuls. Manlius being there present in place. when the multitude came about him to congratulate with God give you joy,&c. (for that there was no doubt, but the whole body of the people would approve this choice of the first Century) came with a great company about him to the tribunal lieat of estate where the Conful sat; and made request unto him, that he would give him the hearing of some few words, and command

C that prerogative century which had given their voices to be called back again to a new ferning. And when every wan was attentive, and expected what he should demand, he alledged for hisex-And when every wan was attended in the property of a first be and as impudent a Generall of an artheoretic a pair of ill eyes. "For a shamelets Pilot of a ship is he, and as impudent a Generall of an artheoretic property of the Oration "my (quoth he) who having to do all by other menseyes, would require to have the goods of T. Mailius "and lives of other men to be put into their hands. And therefore may it please your honour to to the Conful ! "command this Century of the younger fort to give their voices anew, and in creating Confuls, "to remember the war that is in Italy, to confider of the troublesome flate of the Common-" weat, and to think of this, That icarcely yet mensears have had any rest since they resounded and " rung again with the noises and alarms, that the enemies raised within these sew months, when

"they lay in fiege neer unto the wals of Rome. But after these words, when the iaid Century cried D with one accord, that they were of the same mind still, and would nominate the same Consuls again, and none other; then Torquatus, "Neither (quoth he) shall I be able, if I were Consulto "bear with your fashions and conditions, nor you again endure my rule and commandment. To "the ferntiny therefore once again, and think how the Carthaginians war within Italy, and Ami-"bal is the Generall of the enemies. Then the Century moved as well by the authority and reverence of the mans person, as by the applause and admiration of the people, who wonded at his vertue, befought the Conful to call forth and cite a Century of the elder bands for that they would willingly conter with more ancient men than themselves, and by their sage advice and good direction nominate the Confuls. When those elders were called to this Century, there was some timeallowed for to commune apart fecretly with them, within the place railed in, called Ovile. E Thele ancients faid unto them, that they were to confult of three persons, whereof two already were full of honourable dignities, which they had born, to wit Q. Fabius and M. Marcellus, But verily, (lay they) in case ye would have some new Cos to be chosen, for to be opposed against the Carthaginians, yehave M. Valerius Lavinus, a notable man, one who hath performed fingular good service, and atchieved many noble deeds, both by sea and land against King Philip. So when they had three propounded upto them the older were dimitted and the younger entred into a fethey had three propounded up to them the enter were until made a nature younger emire into a necond trakiny; and declared for Confuls, M. Claudius Marcellus (glittering then in the prime of his glory, for the lace hubding and conquest of Sieity) and M. V. derius, who was ablent. This foredom and shoice of the prerogative Century, all the rest followed after, and be their fulfrages confixmed: "Let them mock on now, and fooff hereat all they that have nothing in admiration but Accaptinguity and things done in elder time. For mine own part, if there be any such City and Com-"mon-wealth at all, confifting of wife men and Philosophers, assome great Clarks have rather " imagined in their fansies, than found in effect; I dare be bold to think & fay, that in it there could so not possibly be either rulers and Magistrates more grave and temperate in their desire of dignity sand government, or a people better mannered, nurtured, and instructed. But that it should be shought an unlikely matter and scarce credible that a Century of younger persons were willing 66 to contait with the elder and be advised by them to whom they should give their voices for to be created the chief Magistates; it is the corruption of this our age that is the cause: wherein "we lee how imall reverence and auchority even parents themselves have, and of how slender " and bale account they be amongst their own naturall children.

After this followed the Election of Pretors, wherein were created P. Manlins Volfo, and L. Gadanlins Acidinus, C. Letterjus and L. Cincius Alimentus. When this Election was finished it forspind, that news came, how T. Offacilias (whom the people, as it feemed, would have chosen in hisabsence, to match T. Maglius in the Consulhip, but that the ordinary course of the election was diffusbed and Ropped) departed this life in Sicily. The Apollinare games in the former year had been exhibited and when Calpburnius the Prator putupa bill, and moved the Senate, that they might he delebrated again that year also there passed a decree, That they should be vowed to Somigue from sime to sime for ever.

A the covenants that passed between Annihal and him, he retired himself into Corcres.

The same year certain prodigious tokens were seen and reported. In the Temple of Concordia H the Image of Victory, which flood upon the lantern and top thereof was fmitten with lightning, and being shaken and driven from its own place, rested fast upon those other Images of Vistory that were fixed in the forefront of the faid Temple, and fell not down from thence. Word also was brought, That in Anagnia and Fregella the walls and the gates were likewise blasted and firucken with the from heaven: and that in the marker place of Sudertum there ran streams of bloud a whole day together: That in Eretum it rained ftones: and that in Reme a female mule brought forth a fole. Theie strange and wonderfull figns were purged and expiate with greater sacrifices: and a solemn supplication proclaimed; wherein for one day the people should wholly attend their devotions, and pray unto the gods: and likewife a Novendiall facrifice. In that year died r certain publike Priests of State, and new were chosen in their stead. Caise Livius in the room of M. Pomponius Mathothe High Priest and M. Servilius, to supply the place of Sp. Carvilius Maximus, the Arch-Augur. And forasmuch as T. Octacil: us Maximus, the Prelate or Bishop, died when the year was expired, there was none nominated for to succeed him. C. Claudius the Arch-flamine of Jupiter lost his Flaminship, and was deprived of that Sacerdotall dignity, becausehe had committed an errour in facrificing, when he should minister and distribute the inwards of

About the same time M. Æmylius Levinus (after he had by secret conferences sounded aforehand and follicited the minds of the Ætolian Princes and great LL.) came with a small fleet of thips lightly apppointed, to their general Diet or Councill, immoned before for that purpose on- K ly, In which tolemn affembly, after he had made declaration, "That Syracufa and Capua were "won, and under the protection of the people of Rome, and what good success they had in the "affairs and wars of Italy: and discoursed besides, That the Romans, according to their ancient "custome, received by tradition from their forefathers, used to respect and make much of their "Allies: and namely, That either they received them into the City of Rome, and endued them with the same fran hises that they themselves enjoyed, or else dealt so liberally with them o-"therwise, that they liked of their condition fo wel, as they cho'e rather to be allies than Citizens; "he protested and faid, That the Ærolians should be much more honoured amongst them than " all others, for that they were the first that of all forrain nations beyond sea, entertained league "and amity with them. As for King Philip and the Macedonians, their heavy friends, & dangerous L " neighbours, he had so danted their courages, abated their forces, and driven them to that pals, "that not only they were forced to abandon those towns, which by violence they hadtaken "wrongfully from the Atolians, but also had much ado themselves to keep Macedony itself qui-"et, and without perill of hostility: promising withall, That he would bring and reduce the Acar-"nanians (for whom the Ætolians were so discontented and grieved, that they were dismembred er from the body of their State) under their ancient form of jurisdiction and seignory again, These relations and promises made by the Roman General, were confirmed and assured unto them by the authority and countenance of Scopas (who for the time was the Prætor or head Magistrate of that State land of Dorimachus a Prince of the Ætolians, who with less modelly and greater affeveration and confidency extolled and magnified the greatnels, power, and majefly of the people of Rome, M The principall matter that induced and moved them was the hope of recovering and keeping Acarnania. Whereupon, there were conditions drawn & engrossed, under which they should joyn in league and friendship with the people of Rome. And this branch was added to the rest of the defeazances, That if they were to pleased, and liked well of it, there should be comprized in the fame league and priviledges, the Eleans and Lacedamonians, together with Attalus, Plengatus, and Scordiletw: of which three, Attalns was King of Affa the lefs, the other were pances and Potentates of: Illyricum, The articles ran in this form, Imprimie, That the Ærolians hould immediate ly make war by lang with King Philip, Item, That the Romans at sea should help with twenty galiaces at the leaft, bearing five ranks of oars. Item, Astouching all the Cities that should be conquered (beginning from Æiolia, fo far as to * Corcyra) that the ground whereon the Cities were N feated the edifices, the walls, and the lands thereto belonging, should be seized to the use of the Ætolians: all other goods and chattels elle, should be a prize for the people of Rome, Item, That if the Atolians hapned to make peace with Philip, it must pass with this clause and proviso, that the peace should stand good upon this condition, That Philip abstain to make war upon the Romans and their Allies and all those that lived under their dominions. Item, In case the people of Rome fortuned to piece again, and be confederate with the King, they should put in a cavear and provilo, that he might have no liberty to war upon the Ætolians, or their aflociates. These were the covenants agreed upon: and being fair engroffed two years after into a pair of indefitures the one of them remained for the Ætolians in Olympia, the other for the Romans in their Capitoll, among other facred records and monuments, for a perpetuall memoriall to all posterity. The 9 occasion of so great delay was because the Embassadors of the Ætolians were staid and kept very long at Rome. But that was no let nor hinderance at all to the proceedings in the wars. For the Ætolians presently made war upon Philip: and Lavinus conquered * Zacynthus (2 little Island near to Atolia, having a City within it of the famename, which he forced by affault, all fave the Caltie)likewife * Oeniada and * Naxw, which he won from the Acamanians before and all these he gave to the Æcolians. because he minded at the prime of the Spring to conduct an army into Greece, to the end that Phiano, or Zu. Macedony and the Cities bordering thereupon, should not be molested by the Illyrians, whom chia Nigro. he supposed would be at quiet and not stir, if they were once frighted with the harms of others, he made a judden rode and expedition into the marches of the Oricins and Apolloniats; and when the Appolloniats islued forth against him, he repelled them, and with great fear and terror drave them within their walls. After he had wasted the confines next to the Illyrians, he turned his forces with like celerity and speed into Pelagonia: and then won by affault a City of the

B Dardanians, fituate in the frontires of Macedonia, through which the Dardanians meant to have their passage. And when he had performed these exploits in great haste, not forgetting how the Ætolians and Romans both maintained war against him joyntly, he deicended through Pelagania, Nympheum, and Bolea, into Theffaly; supposing verily that the people of those countries might be incited to wage war together with him against the Ætolians. And leaving there behind him (at the streight of Theffely) Perfess four thousand strong, for to debar the Atolians entrance that way: himlelvin person, before that he should be occupied in greater affairs, led forth his army into Macedonia, and from thence into Thracia, and io torward against the Medians. That nation was wont to make incursions, and to invade Macedony, when loever they could perceive that the King was either busied in other wars, or his Realm disfurnished and slenderly provided C of good gard and strong garritons. He began therefore to forrage and spoil the territories about Phraganda, and to affiult Iamphorina, the principall City and chief strength of that Region

Scopas having intelligence that the King was gone into Thracia, and kept there occupied in the wars, put all the serviceable young men of Ecolia in arms, and prepared war against Acarnania. The nation of the Acarnians, albeit they were both in firength unequall, and also law already, that they had loft the walled City of the Oniades, and Naxus: and knowing well, that the Roman forces would come upon them befides: rather upon anger than any good counfell and advisement. made preparation for war, and resolved to meet them. Their wives and children, and elder perfons fuch as were above forty years of age, they fent away into Epirus, adjoyning near unto them. D Of all that were fifteen years old and upward unto threefcore, they took atolemn outh that they would never return back without vistory. They laid also a heavy curse and crueil malediction apon all those of their own nation: and framed a most humble request, in as effectual terms as they could devile, unto all their friends, that none of them should entertain within their Cities, their a doors and houses, nor admit to their table, any one of them that were vanguished, and fled out ~ of the field : yea, and belought withall the Epirons to gather together the dead bodies of as many of them as should chance to be flain in battell, and to inter them all in one grave and erect a tomb and monument over them, with an Epitaph and inscription to this effect; Here lie buried and entombed the Acarnanians, who fighting in defence of their country, against the violence and injuries of the Etolians, loft their lives manfully in the field. By this means, when their courages were enkind-Eled and incented, they encamped themselves in their utmost frontiers, abiding the coming of their enemies. And having dispatched messengers to Philip, to give notice to him in what jeopardy they stood, they constrained him to give over that war which he had in hand, considering that Iamphorina was furrendred up into his hands, and that he had sped wel otherwise in the rest of his affairs. The Ætolians, upon the first fame that was blown abroad of that folemn oath, taken by the Acarnamians, were wel cooled, and not to hafty to let forward: but hearing once of Philip his coming, they were driven to retire again as far as pollibly they could within their own confines, Neither Philip for his part marched on further than to Cline (notwithstanding that he made great speed afore, and took long journies; for fear that the Acamanians should be surprized, before he could reach unto them) for so soon as he heard that the Ætolians were retired, he himself also returned

Levinus in the beginning of the spring rook the sea, and loosed from Corcyra, and having doubled the point of Leucates, and failed as far as Naupactum, there he published and gave knowledge. That he would shape his course from thence for Anticyra: and that Scopas and the Etolians should there meet him, and be in readiness. This Anticyra is situate in Locris, on the left hand, as yeenter into the gulph of Corinth. By land it is a small journey thither from Naupallum, and as short a cut by sea. So within three daies after they began to affail the City on both sides. The fiercer affault was from the lea-fide, both became they had in their ships engines of battery, and other ordnance and artillery of all forts; and also, for that the affailants from that part were Romans. So within few daies the City was yielded up, and delivered again unto the Etolians, the pillage thereof fell to the Romans share, according to covenant. There Lavinus received letters Girom Rome, specifying thus much, That he was declared Consul in his absence, and P. S.: Ipitius was coming to succeed him in the Province: but by occasion that he lay there sick of a long dilease, he came to Rome later than all men expected.

M. Marcellus entring his Confulfhip upon the Ides of March, affembled the Senat that day. only for form and order take: " for he made open profession there, that during the absence of his "Collegue, he would treat of no matters, either concerning the state of the City, or the Pro-"vinces, But this protestation he uttered wishall, and said; That he knew full well that there were

And I understand that M. I " that the war continueth fill in Sicily, and all to diminish and abridge my glory. The Conini having that day won the commendation and name of one that knew how to rule and governhis affections, difmissed the Senat : and it seemed that there would be a generall vacation not of law iffacters only, but of all other things & as it were holyday (fill, untill the other Conful cameunto the City. This rest and idleness (as the wonted manner is) set the Commons having nothing else to do, a talking: and now their tongues walked apace, ceasing not to ipread rumours, That by this long and continuall was, not only the lands and territory about the City of Rome (especially where Annibal had marched with his cruel army) were wasted, but also Italy was in a manner dispeopled and laid desolate, by reason of so many musters and levies: complaining, that whole armies were defeated and put to the fword at Canva in defence of the Common-wealth: and K that there were two Confuls created, both martiall men, and warriors, over-fierce and eager of fight, such as time of peace and quietness were able to find occasions of war: so little was it to be looked for at their hands, that in time of war they would feek for peace, and fuffer the City to have any breathing time and intermission. These speeches remoured among the commongeople were interrupted and flaid by occasion of a Scare-fire that began in fundry places together about the Forum, in the night of that day, which was immediatly before the festival daies of Minerva, called Quinquarrus. At one and the self-same time the seven merchants shops and ware-houses, which afterwards were turned into five, and the thops of the Bankers and money changers which now are called Nove, (or the new-shops) were on hie. Divers private mens houses also the fire caught, for as then there were no stately Halls and Palaces of the City there built. Likewie the L fire took hold of the common prison, called Latumia the Fish market hall likewise, and the royall gallery or walking place. Hardly could the Chappel of Vesta be faved, and that by the good help and pains-taking effectally of thirteen bondflaves; whose bondage was bought out at the Cities charges, and they made freemen. The fire continued one night and a day: and no manmade Would, but it came by mans hand, and was the practice of some fewd persons; for that the fires began in many places at once and those far diffant afunder. Whereuponthe Conful by the advice and direction of the Senat, made proclamation in wholenman ambity of the people, that wholeever would come forth and give nonce by whole manisthat fire was procured, heilhould be well rewarded: If he were a free man, with a piece of money; if bond, with freedome. In hope of which recompende, a certain flavebolonging to the Cal. vii the Campans, (his name was Man-M med was induced to bewray the matters whom he ferred, and five other young Gentlemen of Caprint who be fathers had loft their heads by the commandment of Q.Fulvim. Those he appeared co have made the faid fires : and he gave them a warning befides, that they intended to do more milichief about the City, if they were let alone, and not apprehended; so they were attached, and their houshold fervants. At the first, these persons made light account both of the informer, and the information they made and elevated the credit that was given thereto: alledging that the day beforeithe party himself being chastised and soonged by his Masters, ran away, and so upon an anger and giddy fit devised (by occasion of this misfortune which was meer califall) to frame an acculation against his masters. But when the matter was averted to their teeth in open place, and that they, by whose ministery the seat was done, were in the midst of the Forum puro N the rack for to utter a truth, then they all made confession of the fact. So as well the Masters that Were the letters thereof, as the lervairs that were privand accessary thereto, had their deems and suffered for it. The informer who disclosed the villany, was made free, and had * 20000 ales

But both the Cost treated and consulted first with the Senate, about the state of the Commonweal, and the government of the Provinces. There Levinus related in what terms flood Macedon and Greece: the Exclians also, with the Acamanians and Locrians: likewise what acts he had atchieved in those parts both by sea and land; and how he had repulsed Philip back into Macedonia, when he began to make war upon the Etolians, who now was settired and gone into the utmost parts of his Kingdom: so as the legion might be withdrawn from thence, for C that the Armado was sufficient to keep the King forth of Italy. Thus much spake he of himself. and of the Province whereof he had been governour. Then both Confuls in common, proposed unto the Senat, concerning the Province. And the LL, decreed that one of the Confuls should take the charge of Italy, and of the war with Annibal: and the other should have under his hand the Armado, whereof T. Ottacilius was the Admiral; and together with L. Cincius the Prator govern the Province of Sicily. They were allowed the two armies which were in Tufcany and in France, confilting of four legions: whereaf two of the former year, that were of Citizen's should be fent into Tulcany, and those two which the Conful Sulpitius had conducted, should be led into France, Moreover, that he should have the government of France, and the leading of the Legions there, whom that Cof, would appoint, whole lot it was to have leaty for his Province. D Into Tufcany was C. Calphurnius fentil with Commission after the term of the Pratorship expired, to have his full jurisdiction to continue for a year. Makewise to Q. Falvar was riligned the keeping of Capua, and his rule prorogued for another year. The armies as well of Citizens as of Allies, were by commandment of the sense abridged and made lefs : fo that for two legions there should be but one, and that consisting of feet thousand too tenen, and three hundred horsement that they should be discharged of souther who had served longest: that of Allies there should be left ieven thousand foot, and three hundred horse: with the same respect and consideration of service in dismissing the old souldiers. As for Co. Fullows the Consult of the former year, the ruled the same Prevince of Apuliastill, without any alteration of his forces a only his government was continued unto him another year. And P. Sulpitius his Colleague, was commanded E to fend away all his army, only the maciners and failers excepted, Likewife order was given that so soon as the new Conful was arrived and landed in the Province of Sirily, the army there. which was commanded by M. Cornelius, should be sent out of Sicily. Unto L. Cincius the Prator were affigued the fouldiers that remained after the defeat at Canne, for to heep Sicily in order. and those arose to two legions. And as many legions were appointed for P. Manlin: Wolfe the Prator, for to go into Sandines, even those whereof L. Cornalins had the leading in the same Prowince the former year. As for the legions of Citizens, the Confuls were enjoyeed to levy and enroll them fo, as they entertained no fouldier of all those who had served in the army, either of M.Claudius, or M. Falerius or Fulvius nor exceeded the number that year of one and twenty legions of the Romans. When these Acts were passed in the Senare-house, the Confuls cast lots for m their feverall Provinces, Sicily and the Armado fell to Marcellus: Italy and the war against Annibal, to Levinus. This lot that fell to Marcellus fo firm hehe Sicilians dead, (who flood in the presence of the Confuls, looking for the event of the lottery) as if Syracufe had been loft again; in such fore, as their pitifull lamentations, and their wofull plaints, for the prefent turned all menseyes upon them, and none after ministred cause of much speech and talk. For they went aboutto all the Senators from one to another in poor and vile array, protesting, "That if Marcellus came amongst them again as L. Deputy, they would not only for ake every man his own country "where he was born, but also abandon the whole Mand of Siety 2 complaining, that without any " defert of their parts, heretofore he had been cruelly bent against them, and his harred was irre-"concileable: and what would be now do in his choler, and knowing that the Sicilians came to G " Rome of purpole to make complaints of him? The Island were better (say they) to be on a light "fire to burn with Æina; or to be all a very sea, than thus to be exposed as a prey unto a mor-"sall enemy, for to be devoured. These grievous moans and pitious complaints of the Sicilians

fust carried to the houses of the Nobles and great men'of the City, and there taken up and much talked of by many, whiles fome pitied the Sicilians, others envied Marcellus, spread abroad at length fofar, until they came to the Council-Table, And the Confuls were dealt withall, to Propoleumo the Senate, that they might exchange their Provinces one for another. So for that time, the Senat having made an t overture unto Marcellus, what they would have done, rather than by any decree prejudiced the matter, brake up.: And the Confuls between themselves privatly made exchange one with the bther. See the fortune and fatall defliny of Marcellus, that haled him, as it were, to be matched with Annibal and to fall into his hands: to the end that the same man, who of all the Romans, was the first that vanouished Annibal in fight, and won the honour from him: should now in the midst of prosperity and happy success of war, be the last Roman General that was slain by Annibal, and wielded the glory of giving him the overthrow. After the Provinces were thus interchangeably thisted the Sicilians were brought into the Senat. Where they made a long speech as touching the perpetuall and constant faithfulness unto the end of K. For which canfe and nothing else Hieronymus was by the hands of the chieftains of their young gallants, as it were by a publike decree of the state made away and killed, and the noblest of their young gen-"tlemen to the number of seventy conspired to murder Hippocrates and Epicides: who being dis-"appointed and put by the effecting of their designment, through the delay of Marcellus, (who at "the time before appointed, came not with his power to Syracule) were appeached, their intenedded plot revealed, and they all by those tyrants put to death. And yet to speak a truth, Marcela les himself was he that gave the first occasion of the syramizing of Hippocrates and Epicides, in "that most cruelly he sacked and risted the Leontins, But from that time forward, the Nobles of 11 " Syracule never cealed to come in untol Marcellus; & promifed to deliver the City into his hands. whenfoever he pleafed. After these and such like complaints Levinus the Consul commanded them to go forth of the

When the Sicilians had their dispatch; the Campans had audience given them in the Senate sand as their ipeeth was more lamentable, to the cante was heavier, and harder to be digelted ; for neise ther could they themselves deny, but that they deferved condign panishment; nor Tyrants had they any, upon whom they might lay the blame. But they thought they had fuffred enough tor their line already, inthat to many of their Senators died by poilon, and to many loft their heads. " Some few of their nobility and but a few remained yet alive, who as they were not touched in " confeience, nor to faulty, as to lay violent trands upon themselves, to the Conqueror in his furious + & wrath, adjudged them not worthy of death : they therefore made humble fuit for themfelves. st their wives and children, to obtain freedom, and to enjoy fome part of their own goods, being, es as they were, meer citizens of Rome, and most of them by affinity and neer kinred, upon mutual ef and crois mariages, linked in alliance and blond to the Romans, After that they also were willed to void out of the Senat house: for a while, there grew some question and doubt, whether Q.Fulwith chould be fent for from Capua (for prefently upon the taking of the City, Claudius the Conful died) that this matter might be argued and discussed in presence of the General himself, like as the other had been reasoned of and debated between Marcellus and the Sicilians. But afterwards when they faw in the Senat-bonfe M. Attilius, and C. Palvins, the brother of Flacens, both his Lieutenants: likewite Q. Minntins, and L. Veturius Phile, Lieutenants unto Claudius, who had w been present in all actions, and were eye-witnesses of every thing; and besides, were unwilling that cither Falvins should be called away from Capita, or the Campans longer delayed : M. Attilius Regulus, who of all them that had been at the fervice of Capua, was of greatest authority and reputation, being demanded his opinion, spake in this wife.

Trake it (quoth he) when Capua was newly won, I was one of Conneel with the Confuls "there, when question was asked, and enquiry made, Whether any one Campane had delerved "Well of us and our Common-weal. And found it was, that two women only to wit; Volta Oppia, er Born in Atella, but dwelling then at Capra, and Fancula Cluvia, fometime a common firmmpet " and curtizan, were well willers unto us. The former of thele twain daily facrificed for the welof fare, life, and victory of the Romans; the other, lectivity fultained the poor and needy Roman it "captives with food and victors. As for all other Campans, from the highest to the lowelt, they
"with the better affected unto us, than the Carthaghistis: And even those, who were beheated to by Quintus Fulviors, fuffered death, not because they state more faulty than others, but for that or files were of greater mark and calling than the felt. Now, that the Senate thould decide the westign of any Campina, who are chiral third decident of Rome, without agreen from the peocople, l'ice not how it can be. For in our fore tartiers fiffe the like case was of the Satricans that er rebelled aand then M. Antifitut'a Tribur of the Commons, first purup a bill, and the Commons es after wards passed it immely. That the Senat mighe have power and authority to give their opiniston, and determine of the Satricans. Therefore I am of mind, that we deal with the Fritons of "the Commons, that one or more of them, prefer a billunto the Commons, by vertee whereof we of or may be authorited to fet down fome order for the Campans. Then L. Artificaja Fribm of the Commons, by leave and advice of the Senate, proposed unto the Commons a bill in this form and manner. Where as the Campans, Atellans, Calatine, and Sabatins, who have yeelded themfebeer unto Fulvius the Pro-confut, to be at the pleasure and devestion of the people of Rome : all these also which they have furrended eighther with them fit bes as well their verricory at their Oity, as all new fils both facted and prophane, their necestary implements, and all other things whatfoover, I demand your will and pleasure. O Daiens, what shall be done wish the promiffes ? The Commons after deliberation, give their voyces to the fild bill in this form. Our will and pleasure, is, that what forver je the Send-Tori, who now are fet to Councel, or the Hoff part of you birth good and determine, Bull frand for jost and lawful. Upon this grant or Act of the Commons, the Senat by a decree awarded unto Office N and Claves, full their own goods and liberty: and moreover if they were defired to crave to ther reward at the Schures hand, they were bell to repair anto Rome. For every family and reversal house of the Campuns, there were special arts and decrees made, all which to repeat and repeate, would not quit the librar. Some had their goods confirme themselves, being failed in a Wive were to be old, before the objection of the popular part of the objection of the obj they made diffiction by valuation of their wealth whiether their goods were to be conflicate All their bealts and carrait which were taken fave Horses all their bond flaves, but males fourteen years of age and upward, all moveable goods alto which were hot annexed o and fallned to the foll, they awayded for to be tellored to the tree owners. As for those that during the time of war had been neither at Capus nor in any other City of Campan, which revolted from the people of Rome, they should be removed to inhabit on this fide the River Lyris between it and Rome: but fuch as were turned and passed to the Romans fide, before that Annihal came unto Capua, they should be transplanted on the hither fide of Vision turnes the River : provided, that none of them should possess either house or Land within fifteen miles of the Sea, As concerning them who were diplaced and confined to inhabit beyond the Tyber, neither they nor their heirs and fucceffors for ever, should purchase and hold houls or Land in any place, but in the territory either of Voit, Surrium, or Nepesium; but so, as they exceeded not the flint of five hundred Acres of ground. As touching the goods and chattels of all the Senstors, of fuch as had born Magistracy in Capua, Atella, or Calaria, they awarded that sale should be B made thereof in Capua. As for those that were free born, and whose bodies were to be fold, they should be sent to Rome, and there set a sale. Finally, the Images and Statues of brais, which were faid to have been won and taken from the enemies, whether they were facted or profane, they referred to the Colledge of the Priests and Prelates, to determine thereof at their diteretion. Thus they gave the Campanes their dispatch, and sent them away much worte apaid for their decrees, than they were when they came first to Rome. And now they complained no more of the cruel proceedings of Q. Fulvius against them, but blamed the iniquity and in just dealing of the very Gods, and their own curled fortune together. After the Sicilians and Campanes were difmiffed, there was a muster taken : and when an army was levied and enrolled, there began some question and reasoning about the mariners and

raile men enow, nor yet find mony at that time in the Chamber of the City, for to prefle and hire

C Rowers to furnish the Gallies. For the accomplishment whereof, when the Confuls could neither them, and pay their wages withal; they published an edict, that private men according to the rate and proportion in the Subfidy book, out of all orders, degrees, and companies, should as aforetime find Rowers at their own charges, and maintain them with meat and money for thirty dayes. Upon which Edict and Proclamation, all men to grumbled and muttered, and were so highly discontented and angred, that they wanted an head and Captain, rather hen matter and occasion of a musiny and injurrection; giving out, "That the Confuls had taken a course, at and were in the very train to plague, undo, and destroy the Commons of Rome, like as they "had already the Sicilians and the Campans. For thus many years they have been pilled, polled, D clean spent and consumed with exaction of tributes, and had nothing left them but the bare " ground, and the same lying wast and untilled. As for their Houses upon their Lands, the ene-" mies had burned; their fervants and hinds, fach as fhould husband and till their grounds, the "Common-wealth had bereaved them of one whiles buying them up to the war, for some small " piece of mony: otherwhiles levying and preffing them to the Seas to be Gally. flaves, for a thing a of nothing, A man could not fo foon get one brais farthing, or fingle filter deneit before-hand, 4 but it went by and by either for Gally-pay, or for yearly Tribute. And to give that now which e they had not, they might never be brought by any force or for any mans commandment what-"foever, ... Let them: fell and make an hand of their goods, imprison and punish their bodies too, "when all is gone befides; feeing there is nothing left them to ranfome and redeem the fame E "again. These and such like words were not only muttred in huggermugger, but attered also and given out in broad terms even in the market-place and before the Conline, by the multitude that Hocked and gathered together in exceeding great numbers : in such fort, as the Confuls were not able with all that ever they could do, to appeale the mutiny, neither by thatpurebukes, nor fair words and comfertable speeches. Then they faid, that they would give and allow them three dayes respit for to think and consider of these matters: which they themselves bestowed whelly and employed in taking a view and furvey of their goods, and making dispatch and riddance thereof out of the way. The next day the Confuls called the Senate together to confule about the topply of Rowers and Gally-flaves: where, after much debating and arguing, that the Commons had good reason to make depial; at length the drift of all their speech was this, "That F whether is were right or wrong, the burden mult lye on privat mens thoulders, there was no re-"medy a for feeing there was no mony in the common cheft, how thould Mariners and Rowers « elle be gotten and levice? This is the only means which we that are Confuls have thought upon and de-" viled, after much talk and conference together. Set to therefore; my malters, in the name of "God, and lead the way : God will blels your good beginnings. So long as the City ftandeth "on foot, and holdeth up the head, no man need to fear his private state; but it shall do well "enough. Go the weal publick to wreck once, and decay, let no man ever think to fave his " own. All the whole house liked to well of these motions, that not only they gave their accord and content thereto, but over and befides, yeelded hearty thanks unto the Confuls for their good w advice and counsel. When the Senat was difmiffed, every man for himfelf brought forth his gold, his filver, and braffe money, and laid all together in common; and that with such speed, striving a vie who could go before another, and have his name entred first in the publick Rolles and Regifters: as neither the forefaid Tribmvirs were able to receive it fast enough, as it was tendred unto them; nor the ordinary Clerks and Notaries to let it down in writing, and take note thereof accordingly. This content and agreement of the Senators, the Knights and Gentlemen of Rome in their place and calling feconded; and the commons for their parts were not behind? So without any confirmint of law, without edich, without any exhortation made by the Magiftrate, the common-weal wanted neither Rowers for to furnish the armadoes, nor mony to pay the Rowers. And thus when all things were provided necessary for the wars, the Confuls went forth to their I feveral Provinces.

Never was there any time of this war, wherein Carthaginians and Romans together, had more tryal of the alternative and variable change of fortune a never hung they more in equal ballance, between fair hope and tearful danger. The Romans, in their Provinces tafted both of tweet and tour. In Spain on the one fide, they freed ill and loft : in Sieily on the other fide; they sped well and won : fo as their forrow was interfaced ftill and mingled with joy. Also in Italy, the lofte of Taventum tixted to their woe and damage ; but the keeping of the Cafflethere with the garrifon, beyond all their hope and expectation, brought them joy and comfort for their forrow. Allo, their suddain fright and fear, for the siege and affault of the City of Rome, was falved and cured again within a few dayes after, by the foreing and winning of Capua: and all that hea-M vines and mourning turned into mirth and gladness. The affairs also beyond Sea, were checked with interchangeable turns and couries. Philip became their enemy in an ill time, and when they had little need thereof. Contrary-wife, the Ecolians and Arraise the King of Affathe left, proved to be their new friends and loving allies : whereby even then fortune, teemed to finite on the Romans, and by that overture, promified as it were, unto them the Empire of the Eals Semblably the Carthaginians, as they loft Capud, fo they won Tarentum, and made a faring game of it. In like manner; as they took so (mall pride and glory, in coming to the walls of Assault without refiltence; to they were danted and difmaid again, that this their enterprit rook no berter effect in the end a and held themselves much digraced and dishonoured, that whiles the fat themselves before one gate of Rome, there was an army of Romans led forth at another, and N fent into Spain. And even in Spain allo, the greater hope men had there; that upon the death of two to noble and valiant Generall; and the defeat of two as pulifant armies, the war was come to a final end, and the Romans driven from thence for ever the more spight it was and the greater grief and vention they conceived again, when by the valour of L. Marina a minhitudiy Capesin, chofen in haft they khe winte how, those former victories unned to vanilles, and came to just nothing. Thus fortune was indifferent, and all things doals and and waverally in tospence, both on the one file and the other. Their hope all one as it was at first; their feathle fame fill, neither more norles : So as between hope and fear, they fared, as if the war af this time Annibal above all other things, was vexed to the heart, that Capua being more holly and o cagerly affaulted by the Romans, than manfailly and faithfully defended by him, had diverted and turned away the heart's of many Shares of Italy from him. For neither was he able to hold them all with fufficient garrifons, unless the would difmember into many famili portions, and mangle by piece-meal his army; which to do then, was no good policy a nor he thought it fate and good, to withdraw his gartifons from thente & leave the fidelity of his allies at liberty, either to depend upon fickle hope, or to Twif with fiddhin fear. And (as he was by hature coverous and eruel-

A ly minded) he resolved at length upon this course, to make spoil of those Cities which he was not able to keep, and so to leave them wast and empty for the enemy. This designment was not 6 difthoneft and shameful in the first enterprise, but it proved as bad and burtful to himself in the effect and conclusion. For he loft the hearts clean, not only of thote that were the parties grieved, and suffered these indignities, but also of all others besides. The present calamity and loss touched but some few : but the precedent and example reached to many more. Neither was the Roman Conful behind hand for his part, to sollicite and found those Cities, from whence he saw some light appear, and any hope to gain them unto him.

There were in Salapsa two noble men above the rest, Dasiss and Blassin. Dasiss was friend to Annibal, Blafins (to far as he might with fafety) affected and favoured the Romans. And by enter-B course of secret mesengers, had put Marcellus in some good hope of betraying the City; but without the heip of Dafine the plot could not be compassed and effected. Wherefore, after much musing and long deliberation, after many stayes and delayes, at length he resolved for want tather of better counsel, than upon any hope to speed) to address himself to Dassim, and acquaint him with the matter. But Dafins not only milliking utterly and abhorring the thing, but also carrying a fecret coming to the party himfelf, the only eye-fore and concurrent that he had, ftriving to be greater than he, disclosed all to Annibal. Whereupon, both were sent for, and convented peremptorily before bim. As Annibal was litting upon the Tribunal lear, giving audience and difpatch to certain other matters; and that he might anon the better attend unto Blafine and the action intended against him: whiles the plaintife and defendant stood apart by themselves from the C reft of the people a good way, Blafin went in hand again with Dafin, and follicited him for to deliver the City to the Romans. With that, Dasim (as if the matter had been too too apparant) ried out and faid, That he bashed not to break unto him and move him, even in the presence and fight of Annibal, for to practife treason and betray the City. Annibal and all they that were there prefent, gave little credit unro Dassius: and the more audacious the thing it felf was, the leftelikelyhood it earried with it of a truth. Every man supposed verily, it was nothing but emulation, envy, and cankred malice, that caused Dasses to charge upon him that crime, which because there was no witness to the contrary, he might untruly devite and more freely enforce against him. And so for that time, they were both discharged the court. But Blasim never gave over to follow still this bold enterprite, but beat fill upon this one point, the wing how good and commodions the thing D would be, both to themselves in private, and to their country in common, until he had wrought him to, and won him to grant, that the Carthaginian garrifon, (and those were Numidians) together with the City Salapia, (hould be rendred unto Marcellia. But without much bloud fied they could not possibly be thus betrayed and delivered : for they were the most hardy and valiant horsemen by far, of all the Carthaginian army. Wherefore, albeit they were taken on a fuddain unprevided, and had no use of Horses within the City, yet with such weapons, as in such a suddain talmult and uprore they could catch and come by, first they asiayed and gave the venture to break through and cleape a way: and when they faw that they could by no means fave themselves and get forth, they fought it out to the last manfully, even unto death: fo as there were not of them above fifty left alive, and came into the hands of the enemies. And furely, the lofs of this cornet of Horiemen, was a greater dammage unto Annibal, than the forgoing of Salapia: for never from that day forward, had Annibal the upper hand in cavalry, which was the only fervice whereby

Much about the same time the Castle of Tarentum was streightly distressed for want of victuals, and hardly could endure and hold out any longer. The only hope that the Roman garrifon had, which lay there, and the Captain thereof M. Livin the Conftable of the Caftle; was in the provision sent out of Sieily. For the safe convoy whereof, along the coast of Italy, there rid at anchor a fleet welneer of twenty fail before Rbegium. The Admiral of this fleet appointed to wast these victuals from time to time, was one Decim Quintim, a man of obscure birth and base parentage, howbeit, for many worthy acts and feats of aims, much renowned in martial ~ r glory.

At the first he had the charge but of five ships, whereof two of the greatest, which were three banked Gallies, were allowed him by Marcelline: afterwards, upon his good fetvice, when he had born himself bravely in many conflicts, he had three more committed unto him, and those were of five banks of oars, until at last himself, by calling upon the confederat Cities, as Rhegium; Velia, and Passum, for the ships due by covenant unto the people of Rome, he had made a prety Atmado, as is abovefuld, of twenty fails. As this fleet had difanchored and was gone from Rhegium, Democrates with the like Armado for number of Tarentinships, encountred almost five leagues from the City of Tarentum, at a port called Sacriportus. It fortuned at that time; that the Roman Admiral, little looking for any battel, earne forth under fail only, but about Crooks and

G Sibaru, he had furnished his ships with Rowers also, and so his sleet for the bigness and talness of the Veffels, was well appointed, and fufficiently armed and manned. And even then it hapned at one time, that both the boilterous wind lay, and the enemies also were within kenning, to as they had scarce time enough to fit their tackling, to make ready their Rowers, and to let in order their fighting men, against a skirmish that was so neer toward. There was not lightly seen e greater conflict, fought more horly and fiercely between two royal Atmadoes that affronted one another, than between these imali fleets. For why, the battel was for a greater matter, than all their (hips came to. The Tarentins mainteined the fight more cagerly, because they were defirous H to recover their Castle out of the Romans hands, as they had done their City, after one 100 years almost, during which time, they had been out of the possession thereof : hoping thereby, if they could be malters of the Sea once by some fortunat and victorious battel, to cut off and intercept all hope of victuals from the enemies. The Romans on the other fide bestirred themselves at luftily a that by keeping the possession of the Castle, all the world might see, that Tarentum was not lost by force, clean thrength and valour, but betrayed by frealth and treachery. So they founded thebattel from both parts, and ran affront one at another, with the beaks and ftems of their prows, and menther staid rowing amain forward, not suffered their enemy to part or go aside from them, until they closed and grapt'd their ships together, by the means of iron books like hands. And so neer they buckled, in hot and furious fight, that not only they discharged shot aloof one against ano- I ther, but also they coped together (as it were) toot to foot, at hand strokes with sword fight. Their prows and for-ships stuck grapled together, while the poops and hin-decks were driven about with contrary oars of the adverte part. So neer and to thick withal flood the fhips, and within fo narrow a room, that icarce one dart light into the water in vain, and did no harm. With their beak-heads they affailed one another, as it had been on land fight, and so close they were, that the fouldiers might passe out of one ship into another, as they fought. Howbeit, two thirs there were above all the reft, that maintained a notable fight, and in the vanguard and forefront of the battel. invested one another most furiously. In that of the Romans was Quintins himself in person and in she other of the l'arentins, was on? Nico, furnamed Perco, a man not only odious unto the Romans, for the publick quarrel between both states, but also maliciously bent, upon a private inight K and rancour, as banding with that faction, which had betrayed Tarentum to Annibal. This Nico elpying Quinting both righting and also encouraging his men withal, charged him at unawares and ran him quite through with a partifan: who was not to foon faln forward headlong upon the foredeck, armour and all, but the Tarentin following the train of his victory, and feeing the ship dilordered and troubled for the loffe of their leader, luftily came forward, and boorded her; laid about bim manfully, and put by the enemies out of his way, until the Tarentins were mafters of the prow and fore calile. Whiles the Romans had much ado (so thrumbled they were and thrust together diforderly) to defend and keep the poop and hind deck; with that, another gally of the enemies appeared on a fuddain, and charged the hind part. So the Roman ship in the midst between both, was boorded on every fide, and taken. Whereupon all the reft were greatly terrified, feeing the L Admiral-fhip was won by the enemy; and they fled on all hands. Some were funk in the deep Sea, fome made haft with their oars, and scudded to the land, but anon were a prize and prey to the Thurins and Metapontins. But of the Hulks and Caricks, which were fraught with victual, and fallowed after, very few there were that fell into the hands of the enemies : the reft faitting and turning their fails cross, this wayes and that wayes, according to the inconstancy of the wind, recovered the main Sea.

But about Tarentum at the fame time, their fortune was nothing fo good. For whereas there went out of the Town upon a four thousand men a foraging, for to purvey corn, Livius, Constable of the Caltle and Captain of the garrison, toying his time (as he waited ever for all opportunities) made out of the faid Caltle 2000 armed louldiers, under the leading of C. Persim a valorous and M industrious man : who set apon the Tarentins stragling out of order, and disperied in wandering wife over the fields; and after he had followed a long time the execution, killing them here and there as he encountred them; the relt, which were but few left of io many, he chaled to the Towns for they made halt in great fear thirher, and were let in at the gates standing half shut, for fear lest at the fame randon the Town should have been loft. So the Tarentins and Romans, when they had made the reckoning, put up all on even hand. For the Romans were winners by land, the Tarentins at Sea: and both of them disappointed alike of their hope of corn, which was presented to their eyes, but they nevertaited thereof.

At the same time Lavinus the Conful, after a good part of the year was gone about, arrived in Sicily, greatly expected and locked for, as well by the old allies as the new and the first thingof N all other and most important, he supposed, was together with this new peace, to settle and compole the State of Syracufa, so much disordered and out of frame. After that, he led his legionsto Agrigentum, where only there remained the reliques of war; which City was kept by a firong garriion of Carthaginians. There fortune favoured his first defigns. Hanne chanced to be the General over the Carthaginians, but he wholly relied and repoled all his hope in Marines and the Numidians. This Mutines had ranged all over Sicily at his pleasure, and raised booties out of the territories and Lands of the Roman affociats, and by no force or policy could be be intercepted of his passage back to Agrigentum, nor yet be pinned within the City, but that he would illue forth whenloever he lifted. This glory of his, because now it checked (as it were) the fame and honour of the General, turned the man at length to displeature and danger : fo as, what good O fervice foever was atchieved, it was never well taken by Hanno, nor joyoully accepted, in regard of the perion, who was a prick alwayes in hiseye. Whereupon in the end he gave away the Captainship of Mutines from himself, and bestowed it upon his own Son: thinking, that together with his government and command, he should lose all his authority and reputation also among the Numidians. But it fell out far otherwise. For the more that he was in diffrace and disfavour with Hanne, the greater grew the old favour and love of the Numidians toward him. Neither

A Neither could be himself endure any longer the un worthy wrong and indignity offered unto him . and therefore in revenge be presently dispatched certain seeret mestengers unto Levinas, with credence, that he would berray and deliver Agrigentum into his hands. By the mediation of theic intercourriers, there patied infficient fecurity and affurance between them: and the matter being concluded, the manner also of contriving the plot, was agreed upon. Whereas therefore the Numidians were possessed, and had the guard of that gate that openeth toward the Sea: after they had either driven out the old warders from thence, or killed them, they let in the Romans at the same gate into the City, who were sent of purpose, according to the former agreement. And when they marched up into the midft of the City, even to the market place, with banner diplated, and with great camult and notie; Hanne supposing it was nothing elie, but a seditious upriling of B the Namidians (like as they had done tometimes before) came forth as to appeale and fray a mutiny and commotion. But discovering a greater multitude afar off, than the Numidians were: and hearing withat the Romans to shout, with the manner whereof his ears had been well acquainted before time, he took him to his heels ere he came within the dart-shot. And bring let out at a back poffern gate, taking with him Epicides, he recovered with some few other the Sea side, where, as good hap was, they light upon a small bark or pionace; and to leaving Sicily to the enemies, for which there had been much thrife to many years together, they palled over into Affrick The malitude befides both of Carthaginians and Sicilians, without any skirmith either begun or intended, fied like blind men they wilt not whither and finding all wayes made up, and no paflage forth, they were milerably flam and hewn apieces about the gates. Lavinus being pollefled of the C Town, cauled all the chief men and rulers of the City, to be beaten with rods, and to love their heads: all the reft together with the pillage he fold in port-fale, and the mony that was railed

When the news of this misfortune of the Agrigentins was blown over Sicily, all at once turned ~ Roman, and Annibal loit all. For in short space there were 20 Towns betrayed and yeelded, six forced by affault, and to the number of 40 voluntarily furrendred to the devotion and protection of the Romans. The principal noble men of which States, after that the Confuls had either rewarded or punished according to their several demerits, and compelled the Sicilians generally to lay by arms and weapons, and to take themselves to the plough, for to ear, till, and low their grounds; to the end that the Hand might bring forth fruit, not only to fulfain and maintain the natural inhabitants thereof, but also to ease, the price of corn and victuals in the City of Rome, and throughout all Italy, like as it had done many times before : be transported over with him into Italy a rabble and damned craw of unfully people from Agasirna. Some four thouland there were of them, 2 confuted multitude of all forts, a very mith math and fink, dunghil of vile and wretched persons, - most of them Outlaws, Bankrupts, and notorious malefactors, in danger of death by the laws of their Cities where they lived. And being fled their countries, some for one fact, some for another, they chanced all upon like fortune to fort themselves (as commonly birds of a feather will flie together,) and at Agatirna, they made choife like outlaws, to live by robbing and spoiling, and this was their only protession and trade. Lavinas thought it no good policy to leave behind him their good fellows in an Iland, which began but now upon new peace to knit and unite again; for fear E left they would minister matter of innovation and change; and besides, there was some good nie of them among the Rhegins, for to forage and rove about the Brutians country : for fuch they ftood in need of, and had laid for a company which were acquainted with theeving and ficaling.

And io this year made an end of the war in Sicily.

P. Scipio L. Deputy and General in Spain, having in the prime and beginning of Spring put his ships to Sea and set them aflote, and by an edict summoned all the aids of the allies to repair to the Rendez vous at Taracon; gave order and commandment, that as well the ships of war as of charge and burden, should from thence set forward, and shew themselves at the mouth of the River Iberus. And after he had given direction and charge, that the legions from out of their winter harbors, should there meet together, himself accompanied with five thousand of his allies p put himself on his journey to his main army. Being thither come, he thought it good to make some speech to the old souldiers especially, as many as remained alive after so great defeats and overthrows, and when he had allembled them all together to an audience, in this wife he spake unto them. "Never was there new General before my felf, that could by good right, and in "regard of defert, render thanks unto his fouldiers, before he had employed them, and made The Oration "tryal of their good service. But as forme, before I ever came within fight of this Province, of P. Sapinto "before I entred my government and faw the camp, fortune bath obliged me, and made me be-"holden unto you. First, for your kindness and zealous affection to my father and to mine un-"cle, both while they lived, and when they were dead. Secondly, in that when the possession of this Province was loft; siter to great foils and everthrows, ye have by your vertue and va-G cleft, the next successor in place of soveraign rule and command. But forstmuch as our ful "purpose and present resolution is, by the leave, favour, and power of the Gods, not to much "to hold the postession our selves and abide in Spans, but to dispossesse Carthaginians that "they may have no footing nor abode at all there: and fince the thung that we go about, is not eto fland keeping the bank of Iberas, for to ftop the passage of the enemy; but to give the at-

"us into his own country, and to come home unto him. I fear me greatly, left this will feem to "unto fome of you a greater defignment, and more audacious enterprise of mine, than may ei-"ther fuit and fort with the fresh remembrance of thole late defeats, or stand well with my roung " and unripe age. The foils and unfortunat foughten fields in Spain, can be of no man in the "World forgotten later than of my felf, whose father, whose Uncle, were within the space of " 30 dayes there flain, to the end that forrow upon forrow, funeral opon funeral, one monraful et death after another, should infortunatly be heaped upon our house and family. But as this de-" folate effate and defect almost of all my house and name (wherein I only, in manner, am lest alive of my race) woundeth my heart and makes it bleed, as often as I think of it : to the publick fortime and vertue of the Common-weal, reviveth my spirit again, and will not suffer me to dese spair totally of the state of this Empire: considering the deltiny and Providence of the Gods, I "whereby it is a thing given unto us, and our luck hath ever been, that howloever we have recei-"ved overthrows in all great wars and dangerous battails, yet in the end, we have gone away es with the victory. I omit to speak of old examples, of Forfena, of the Gauls, and Samnits: and "I will begin at the Punick wars. How many armadocs and fleets, how many brave Captains, "howmany valiant and puissant armies were there loft and milear ied, during the former? And what should I say of this in our dayes? In all the defeats and overthrows, I was either present my felt in person; or if I were not in any of them, yet I am sure, I was he that felt the imart of "them, more than any man elle whatloever. The River Trebia, the me e Thraf menu, the Town "Canna, what are they elfe, but the very fepulchres and tombs of the Roman armies there heven in pieces, and of their Confuls flain. And thereto, the general revolt of Iraly, the rebellion of to " Sicily, the falling away of the greater part of Sardinia. Moreover and belides, this last afright and terror; namely, the Carchaginians camp pitched between Anio and the walls of Rome, and "Annibal leen well neer, as conqueror at the very gates of our City. In these to great ruins and at adverse diffresses of our state, yet the vertue alone and valour of the people of Rome hath stood er upright, found, and immutable : yea, and hash railed up again and fet on foot, all that which lay " along on the ground. You only, my valorous fouldiers, were the first, that after the discomfiture " of Canne, under the leading and good fortune of my father, withstood Afdrabal in his journey and " expedition toward the Alps, purpoling to go down into Italy; who if he had joyned with his * brother Annibal, certainly by this day, there hadremained no memory of the Roman name. ec And in very truth, these affairs falling out to prosperously, made amends and recompende for all L. the former lottes. But now through the goodness of the Gods, all things prosper and go well "forward : and the affairs of Italy and Secily both, mend daily, and are every day better that other. In Sicily, Syracufe and Agrigentum are won and wholly ours: the enemies be driven ec out of all the Hand, and the state is reduced into the form of a Province, subject to the people of "Rome, and under their obestance. In Italy, the Town of Arps is recovered by surrender, the "City of Cappa is forced by affault. Annibal himself, having measured all the way. (but in fearfull hast and in manner of a slight) as long as it is from Rome to the Brutians country (in high "Calabria,) is there driven up into the furthell angle and corner thereof, nothing mo e wishing "and praying for at Gods hands now, than to be able to re ire and get away fate out of his ene-"mies Land. What thing then were leffe betterning, my hardy fouldiers, than this, It you who M "have sustained and upheld the decaying and down-falling estate of the Roman Empire in this "Province, you (I say) together with my two parents (whom for the reverence that I owe to "them, give me leave to make equal, and to honour with that name) at what time as calamities "and losses, hapned suddenly one in the neek of another, and the Gods themselves seemed to take " part and stand with Annibal; should now let fall your courages and be faint-hearted, because in "those Provinces aforesaid, all things go well to our hearts delire and great contentment. As for "the late misfortunes and advertities which have hapned here, would to God they had passed over "without forrow, as well of my part, as of yours. But for the prefent, the immortal Gods, Prote-" ctors and Governors of the Roman Empire, who inspired into the minds and hearts of all the "Centuries, to with and chute me to this place of foversign honor, even the fame Gods by sugu- N er ries and auspices, by all tokens of the birds either by flight or fight, yea, and by visions also in the " night featon, do portend, fignifie and promife unto me, all good speed and happy successe: yea "and mine own mind giveth me, (which ever hitherto, hath been to me the trueft prophe, and "never deceived me)that all Spain is ours and that within fhort time the whole Punick min; and "nation, being expelled and driven out from hence, shall fill all Seas and Lands with their shame-"full and dishonorable flight. That which my spirit and foul of it self presageth, the same dothres-"ion also conclude by most certain and infallible demonstration. The allies and subjects here of "the Carthaginians, oppressed and wronged by them, have humbly by their Embassadors craved "our aid and fuccour. The Captains General of their forces, being at difference and odds all three " among themselves, infomuch as they had like to have departed and revolted one from the other, O " have diffracted and difmembred their forces into three parts, and bestowed them in three lever-" all countries, most removed and distant asunder. And no doubt, the like tortune is ready to fall "upon their heads, which lately was our undoing and overthrow, upon the jame occasion. For ecven as we before were fortaken of the Celtiberians, to are they now abandoned of their allies. " Befides, they parted and divided their armies afunder : which was the only caute, that brought the utter ruin and destruction upon my father and uncle. And be ye ture, that their intestine

A "discord and diffention, will never little them to joy afferfully and unite again in one. And thus "fingled as they are, they cambot possibly withfluid our pullance. Now my fouldiers, for your "part, do but favour the name of the Seipier: do but affect and love me, the iflue and off foring of 'Ayour noble Generals, budding forth again (as it were) out of the old flock, cut down to the roots. "Go to, old fouldiers, and redoubted leveliors, with bor-courage fet over the River Iberns a new "army and a new Captain: pals over with them into those Lands, which ye have often conquered, and wherein we have archieved many valiant and memorable acts. And for my felf, I will fo " endeavour and effect, that as ye now agrille in me, the telemblance of my fathers and uncles vi-" fage and countenance, the fame feature, proportion; and lineaments of the body: fo I will bew and represent date you, the true pattern and portraicture of their spirit, wit, faithfulness, and ver-B atue, even as the express and lively image taken and drawh from their own telves : in such fort, as "every man may tay; That Captain Seine is either rifen fibill the dead, or new born sgain. Having by this Oration, incented and inflamed the tourages of his fouldiers, and left Syllanus with a guard of three thouland foot, and three hundred Hotle; for the defence of that coast; he transported over the River Iberus, all the reft of his forces, amounting to the number of five and twenty thouland foot, and 25 hundred Horfemen. There he was advised by some about him, seeing the Punick armies were departed into three countries to far remote and diffice afunder, to fet apon and affail that which was next . but he doubting and fearing left by that means he should draw them altogether, and knowing that he was not able alone, to match and make his part good with id many holts at once, determined in the mean while; to be doing with new Carthage, and to beliege C and affault it. This City, as it Was rich and wealthy in it felf, lo it was full of all the enemies furniture and provition for war. There was their armour kept, there was their money laid up, there remained the holtages of all Spain. Befides, as it was leated commodibully to cross over from thence into Affrice to it food upon a convenient and large haven, able to receive and harbour the greatell navy at Sea, and the only haven (if I be not deceived) of all that coast and tract of Spain, which boundeth next upon our Sea. But no man was made privy to his determination, or knew whither they should take their journey, fave only Leline. He being tent about with the armado, had direction to to temporife and guide his courfe by fail and oar, that at one and the lelf fame inftant, both Scipio might prefent his Land forces in the view of Carthage, and the fleet enter the haven. So they depared from Iberth, and within feven dayes came before the City of Carrhage, both by Sea B) and Land. His camp be pitchedon the north-fide of the City: which he entrenched and fortified on that ontward back part, that flood farthelt from the City as for the ferefront, it was by natural fituation of the ground; defended furely enough. For the fire of Carbage is in this fort. There is a gulf or treek of the Sea, in the middle coill and river well neer of Spain; opposite most to the of New Car. South-west wind, running & retiring in length within the Land half a mile bying out in breach the sec. fomewhat more. In the very mouth of this creek, there is a little I land from the open Sea; which faveth, fheltereth, and defendeth the haven from all other winds, but only the Southwest. From the inmost nook of this bay there beareth out a promontory like ademy Hand, which is the very Hill or Cape whereupon the City is built. The fame on the East fide and the South, is compassed with the Sea : from the West, it is enclosed with a lake or standing mear, which also spreadeth so new hat E toward the North, of an uneertain depth; which altereth according to the tide, and as the Sea either ebbeth or floweth. Now, there is an elbo or bank of firm ground, lome, what leffe than a quarter of a mile over, that joyneth the City with the main or continent. To that fide (not withit anding it had been no great piece of work there to fortifie) the Roman General call no trench, nor railed any rampier : either upon a brave and hauty mind; to thew the enemy how confidently he trusted in his own strength; or because, whensoever he advanced to the walls of the City (as oftentimes he took occasion to to do) he might have open recourse and regress again into the camp. But when the atter fide, which required fortifications, was finished, he let the thips in order within the haved making a fibe was if he would be fiege them also on the water fide. And when he had gone through all his armado, and given the Captains of the flips in charge, to look well to their F centincis and watches in the night (for that commonly themles at their fifth befreging, make what attempts and adventures they can merery place) he retuteed into his camp. And because he would not only yeeld his fooldiers good reason of this his defigument, in that he began war first and principally with the belieging of that City; but alto encourage them, and put them in good bope of the winning and conquest thereof, he assembled them together, and discoursed before

"My valiant fouldiers and trufty friends, If ady mail here thinketh, that ye are brought hither The Oration "to affail a City only, and there an end t he rather makerte reckoning of your prefent pain and of Scipie to his "travel, than eathern the profit and commissing thereof cultiling. But knowing that you are well a "appointed already, and prepared to the fervice, I will fay no more but this: Now for the honour "of the Romans, let us go couragiously to it, and with all our might and main affault new Car-" thage, And when they all with one accorderied unto him, to to do indeed, and that no other thing was first to be done; then he advanced before Carebage, then he gave commandment to affail it at once, by Land and Sea. Mago the Captain of the Carthaginians on the other fide, when he faw preparation made by Water and Land to give the affault; for his part ordered his forces and disposed them in this manner. To make head against the Romans on that side where they lay encamped, he opposed two thousand Townsmen : with a guard of five hundred fouldiers he kept the citadel a other five hundred he placed upon a little hill belonging to the City which looketh to the East : all the other multitude what foever, he appointed to make refistance in other places, w where any outcries, shouts, or suddain alarms should be given. Then having set open a gate, be tendeth those forth, whom he had arranged in that street which leadeth directly to the camp of the enemies. The Romans (according as they were commanded by their Leader himself) in the beginning gave ground a little and retired, to the end, that during the time of skirmish and confl &, they might be neerer to the supply of succours, which were to be sent to second them from behind. And verily at the first they stood to it stoutly on both parts, and there was no ods perceived. But afterwards, the Romansbeing still freshly reenforced from out of the camp, not only discomfitted the enemies, and put them to flight, but pressed on them so bard, as they sed disordered and out of aray, that if Scipio had not founded the retreat, it feemed, that they would have intermingled themselves pelmel with those that ran away, and tushed into the City with them. With the in the City throughout there was no less fear than in the battel. Many courts of guard and other places were abandoned, the curtein of the walls was left naked, and every man made what thirt he could to leap down and escape. Which when Scipio perceived (who now wasturned to a mount which they call Managing Tentates) and namely, that the walls were void of all the defendants, he commanded all his guildiers to liftee forth of the camp, to let forward to the affault, and to bring ladders to scale. Himself in person, defended with the shields of 3 tall lufty young men going before him (for by this time they let flie afresh from the walls a mighty volley of shot or all sous) approached the City. There he exhorted, encouraged, and commanded them to do what was requifite in this fervice. And that which made most to enkindle the coursees of the fouldiers, he was there personally as an eye-witness and beholder of each mans valour or cowardise. Whereupon M they fluck not to run upon the very thot, and to receive many a wound : and now nothing could keep them back : neither the strength of the walls, nor the armed men that stood thereup., n. but. they scaled striving who could mount upon the walls first. At the same time, that part of the City allo which the Sea beat upon, began to be affailed by the thips. But from thence, it should seem, they made more ado with houting and barrying, than effected ought by any forcible affault. For whiles they came close to the walls with their thins, whiles they put forth their ladders and their fouldiers; whiles every man laboured to gain the Land, the necrett way he could : what with their firiving and haft-making, they hindred one another. And by that time Mago had filled the walls full of armed men, who let flie arrows, Javelins, darts, and all kind of thot, whereof they had gethered together exceeding great flore. But neither men, nor arrows and darts, nor any things elle N defended the wall so much as the very wall it self. For few ladders they had that could reach up to the top: and the longer any of them were, the more weak also they were. Whereupon, Wifefon that they who were climed up to the highest rounds, could not gain the parapet and discharge the ladder, and yet some or other still clambred up after, the ladders being overcharged with the weight, brake in pieces. Some again there were, that notwirhftanding the ladders under them held ftill and ftood unbroken, yet when they looked down from on high, their eyes to dizled, and were overcalt with a mift, that they loft their fight, and fell from the top to the ground. Thus when ladders here, and men there, came tumbling down, and the enemies upon their good freed grow to be more barty and hardy, the retreat was founded which gave to the belieged within the Town not hope only of prefent reft and intermission of fo great labour and toil, but also assured them in O manner, for the time to come, that the City was tenable against all scalades, although it were invelted therewith round about. And as for fabricks and mounts to be raifed and planted against it, they were not only difficult and hard to be performed, but also would ask some long time : and Minister in the mean while, space sufficient for the other Generals of their own to come to the rescue. But scarce was the first assault fully ceased, when Seigie commanded other fresh and unfoiled fouldiers, to take the ladders of them that were wearied already and wounded, and

A with greater violance to give a new Camifado. Himfelt, fo faon as he underflood that it was cho and low water, having been adverrised by certain afficiency of Taracan (who fometimes with light boats afed to row, and other whiles when their veilele topiched the ground, to wate all over the lake upon firm ground) that men might eafily pade to the walls on foot; thither to that place he brought all his fouldiers to the affault. It was now almost goon-tide of the day a and besides that the water of it telf naturally fell with the cob into the Sea, there was a good round northern wind arole, which drave the water out of the lake (which now was well faln) after the tide, and discovered such shallows, that whereas in some places thereof they went up to the navel, in some again they waded learce knee deep. Which albeit Sciais knew well to be an ordinary thing in natural reason, and therefore with good forecast had made provision accordingly to take that advanisge, yet he turned it to a miraculous and prodigious accident, attributing all to the immediate handy-work of the Gods as who so give passage and footing to the Romans, had turned back the course and current of the Sea, discharged lakes of their water, and opened wayes unto them, that never before were troden with the fole of mans foot; and therewith he willed his loudiers to follow Neptune, the guide and Leader of the way, and to paile boldly through the mids of the lake close to the very walls. On the Land fide the affailants had exceeding trouble in standing under the walls: for not only they were bindred by reaton that the curtein was to high; but allo as they went, they lay open and under their shot, and were wounded both wayes, so as their flanks and fides were more annoyed as they approached under, than their faces and forefront of their bo-C dies. But on the other part, as they went quietly and early through the mear to the wall, fo they climed forward as securely to the very top thereof. For neither was it throughy fortified with bulwarks, nor raifed to any height by industry and art of man, as being supposed by natural fituation of the place, and the standing lake besides, strong enough and sufficiently defended ; nor any guard of armed men were there in watch and ward, opposed against the affailants e whiles every man was buly, and wholly intended to help there, from whence (ome danger was feen. The Romans being thus entred the City over the walls without any skirmith, marched from thence with what speed they could, unto that gate, about which all the fight and hot skirmish was already begun: for there no couly all their minds were bent and a muten, but also their eyes and ears were accupied and postessed; whiles iome fought, others looked on and encouraged the figh ers ; in such fort, D that there was none of them all once perceived or knew that the City was taken and surprised behind them, before the darts flew about their ears and light upon their back parts, and until they had the enemies both before and behind. Then not only the wells were taken (when the defendants upon a twofold fear, were driven to abandon them) but also the gate from withinforth and without, began to be broken down : and anon, after continual minning and beating against it; the pie, deaves thereof perforce flew apecces, because there might be nothing to impeach or let them, in their centrance a then the armed couldiers brake in most furiously. Many already had scaled the walls, and got over, but they turned and betook themselves every where to maliscre and make havnok of the Townsmen. But the main bettel, which entired in at the gate with their Captains, orderly by companies and sanks in their array, marched forward through the midft of the City to E the market place. From whence Seisio might fee the enemies die two wayes, fome to the forereis upon the hill aforetaid, which standetheouthe East, and was kept with a guard of five hundred touldiers : other into the citadel, into which Mag-himfelf, with all the armed men in a manner, who were driven from the walls, had retired and fled for to fave himfelf. Wherea he dent a part of his forces to win the faid Hill, and himself in person led the selt to the Calle. And as the fort upon the Hill was taken at the first assult and onlet given, so Mage, after the had a white made fome means to defend the Callie, focingal places full of enemies, (warming every where, and no other hope, weekled himself, she citadel, and the gartifon. That day Scipio, having committed the charge of guarding and keeping the City unto Lelius and the mariners, brought back the legions into the camp, and commanded the fouldiers to refresh their bodies with food and reft, wearied as they were, and over-laboured in one day with all manher of toil and work that belongeth to war-fervice: as who, had both fought a battel in the field. and also taken to great pains, and undergone to much hazard and danger, in affaulting and forcing the City, yea, and after it was won, had fought with diladvantage of ground, with those that were fled into the Caltle.

"The next day, after he had called both fouldiers and mariners together, first he rendred laud and 45 praile, yea, and thanks unto the immortal Gods, who in one day had not only made him Lord of "s the most mighty and wealthy City in all Spain, but also had laid up for him there sgainst his coming, all the riches well-neer of Affrick and Spains whereby as the enemies now had nothing selefe them, to he and his had all things plentiful. Whereupon there were two that put in for it, and deplanded the fame Q. Trebelling a Centurion of the fourth Legion, and Sext, Digitm, a Servitor at the Sea. Neither traved thefe parties themselves so hotly about the matter, as the love and favour of them fet all the whole army divided into legionary fouldiers, and fervitours at Sea, in an f Hear of contention; to labout for him that belonged to their fide, and was a member as it were of their body. C. Lating Admiral of the fleet, went with the Sailers and Seamen. M. Sampronius Tudrame was altogether for the legionary Land fouldiers. But to return again to Scipio: "When he had called forth the hoftages into his presence first he ec bad them all in generall to be of good cheer: for why? they were now in the hands of the peo-" ple of Rome, who ever defired to bind men unto them by favours and good turns more than to "awe them with fear and dread; and to have forrain nations knit and joyned in faithful amity, of rather than held in subjection by heavy servitude. Then after he had taken the names in writing of their leverall Cities, he alforeviewed the number of the prisoners, and counted just how C many belonged to every State. Which done, he dispatched messengers home into their countries, willing their parents and friends to come and receive every man their own. If haply any Embassadors of their Cities were present, he restored unto them their own hostages without delay: for all the reft, he gave express charge to C. Flaminius the Treasurer to see unto them in all kind, courteous, and liberall usage. Whiles he was buse in taking this order, there hapned to come from among the hostages, even out of the midst of the company, an aged gentle woman, the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, a Prince and great Lord of the Hergetes, "She shed tears, and " fell down prostrate at the seet of the L. General, and with all began to beseech him most instant-" ly, to give a more special charge, concerning the custody of the women-fex: and to recommend them to their keepers, for to be guarded with a carefuleye, and to be kept and attended on D" more tenderly. Why? quoth Scipio, I warrant thee good woman, they shall want for nothing "that is meet for them. Then replied this Dame again, We fland not fo much (quoth she) upon "thefe terms; for a little thing, God wot, may ferve and content them in this poor estate and low c condition : my care is for another matter, when I confider and behold the young and tender "age of these maidens here. As for my self, I am now past date, and without danger of that injury, which our fex is subject and exposed unto, Now there stood about her the daughters of Indibihis, virgins in the fresh prime and flower of their age, and passing fair and beautiful withall; befides fome other Ladies as nobly born as they: who all honoured her as their natural mother than barethem. Then Scipio, "I would (quoth he) in the ordinary course as well of mine own discipline "as of that which is established by the people of Rome, have a respective consideration, that no E cone thing among us should suffer abuse, which elsewhere in any place of the world is held invi-" olable: this would I do, I say, for mine own credit, and for the honour of Rome: but to have a a more special eyethat way, your own vestue also and worthiness bindeth me: who in the midst of thele your calamities and mileries have not forgot your womanly carriage and the honour of "your fex. And thereupon he delivered them over to the cultody of a man of approved honefty and integrity, commanding him to guard them with no lefs reverence, modelly, and continency, than if they were the wives or mothers of their nearest friends that gave them entertainment, Afther this, there was prefented unto him by his fouldiers a damolel and virgin of ripe years, taken also prisoner: but so wellfavoured and surpassing in beauty, that wheresoever she went every mans eye was upon hes, in admiration of for fare and perfect a creature. Scipio having enquired of Fher country where she was born, and likewise of what parents she was descended; among other things learned, that the was esponsed unid affianced to a young Prince of the Celtiberians, whose name was Allucius. Fosthwith he sent home to her parents and foresaid spouse, for to repair unto him: and in the mean time he understood that her husband that should be was wonderfully enamoured of her, and ready to die for her love. So foon as the young Gentleman was come; Scipio entred into a more familiar speech with him, than he did either with the father or mother of the thaiden, and in these terms he entertained him : "I am a young man (quoth he) as well as your self. Come on therefore, letus young men both devile and commune together more freely, and: The rare con-"not be too nice, coy, and balhfull one to the other. Referred is to the hath becoand kept for you alone, that you might receive her at my hands, uniported and un-Fouched, and apreferst befeeming meand you both. In lieu and recompense therefore of this "hoon and girt which I now beltow upon you, I require at your hands again this only pro"mile and faithful covenant, that you will be a friend and well-willer to the State of Rome, and if of you take me indeed to be a good and honest man, such as these nations and people here have known my father and ancle to have been before me know you thus much, that in the City of co Rome, there are many more like unto us : and that there cannot at this day a nation in the world to be named, which you would wish less to be an enemy to you and yours, or defire more to en-Stertain as your friend. The young Gentleman being abashed for very modelty, and yet right glad and joyfull withall, held Scipio by the hand, called upon all the gods, and befought them in his I behalf to thank and recompence him therefore, fince it lay not in his own proper power, in any proportion or measure to be thankful and make requitall, either as himself could wish, or as Snpio had deserved. Then were the parents and kinsfolk of the maid called for who seeing the damofell freely rendred and given them again, for whose ransome and redemption they had brought with them a fusfix ient fura of gold; fell to intreating and requesting Scipio to vouchfafe for to acept the same at their hands, as a gift and token of their good will: affuring him, that in so doing. they should take themselves no less bound and beholden unto him, than for the restoring and delivering of the virgin untouched and undefiled; Scipio seeing them so earnest and importunate, promised for to receive it, and withall, commanded that it should be laid down at his feet: and calling Allucius unto him, "Here (quoth he) over and besides all your other dowry which your K " father in law must pay you, have from me thus much more money to mend your marriage with. " take this gold therefore to your felf, and keep it for your own ule. And so after this rich reward given, and great honour done unto him, he was dismissed, and departed home with much joy and hearts content: where he made report unto his countrymen and people of the praise-worthy vertues of Scipio, and the favours from him received; faying moreover, there was come into Spain a young man refembling the immortal gods in all respects; who as well by bounty, liberallity. and bestowing benefits, as by martiall prowess and force of arms, is in the very way to win and conquer all, So when he had affembled and mustred all his vasials and tenants, he returned within few daies accompanied with a train of fourteen hundred of the best and most choice horsemen of his

Scipio keeping Lelius still with him, untill by his advice and counsel he had disposed of the captives, hostages, and other prizes and pillage: after he had fetled all in good order, appointed a Galiace of five banks of oars, wherein he embarked the prisoners, with Mago and tome fifteen Senators befides, who together with him were taken, and tent them to Rome with a mellenger to carry tidings of this victory. Himfelf determined to lojourna few daies in Carthage, which time he spent in training and exercising his souldiers, as well of land service as at sea. The first day he caused the Legions to run to and fro in their armour four miles out in length. The second dayle commanded them to fcour and furbish their harness and weapons before their tents. Upon the third day they joyned and encountred in battel-wife, and practifed to fight with blune wasters and baltons; yea, and lanced one at another darts and javelins, rounded at the point end with M bals in manner of foils. The fourth daythey refted and reposed themselves! On the fifth day again they ran at turnament as before armed. This order they kept, exercifing, labouring, and retting by turns, fo long as they abode at Canthage. And thus much for the Legionary fouldiers. The fea-fervitors and maxiners used in calm water and still weather to row spointo the fea, and there' to make triall of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, representing shows of lea-figheand skiemish. Thus without the City, they enured their bodies, and quickned their spirits and coursges both on land and water. Within the town there was nothing heard but preparation of warfurniture. the Carry, the reft diguld play upon the back of their enemies : himfelf iterating efthous unto 14 this man the pame of Co. Fultum; for likenels fake, because two years before in the very same our scissive had vanguifned another Co. Fulvias who was Przetoralio, affured them of the like fuccels ment in this conflict. And verily this conceit and hope of his proved not vain and frustrate. For when as incloic fight and skirmith of the footmen many of the Romans were fall down and flain, but for as yet the ranks flood unbroken, and the enfigns upright behold a fuddenfresh charge of the horiganen on their back, and a great shout of the enemies withall descried and heard from the camp first discomfited the first legion, which being marshalled in the second battaillon, had been put in difarray before by the Numidians, & then the fift, & so consequently even those that found in the forefront of the vanguard before the enfigns. Some fled amain, others were killed in the midft between, where Cn. Fulvius himself with twelve Tribunes of Knight marshals were left dead I in the place. Of Romans and Allies how many died in that conflict, who is able to fet down for certain; feeing in some records I find the number fifteen thousand, and in others not above seven

The conqueror, Annibal was Master likewise of the Camp and all the pillage there. As for the town Herdonen, because he understood for truth, that it minded to have revolted unto the Romans, and would not continue talt in their fidelity, if his back were once turned: after he had conveyed away the multitude of the inhabitants to Metapontum and the Thurians, he fet it onfire and burnt it quite. The Nobles and principall Citizens, who were known to have had fecret talk and conference with Fulvius he put to death. The Romans, who out of fo great an overthrow escaped, made shift by divers and fundry waies to flie, half naked as they were, to Marcellus the K Colinto Samtum. But Marcellus nothing dismaied and afrighted at this fo great defeat, addresfeth his letters to the Senat at Rome, with advertisement of the loss of the Captain Generall, and the army at Herdenea: giving them yet to understand how himself, even he who after the Cannian field had tamed and danted Annibal, as lufty and proud as he was upon that victory, was minded presently to encounter him, and make him take no long joy and pleasure, wherein he now so vanted and exalted himself.

And at Rome verily, as they mourned much for the loss past, so they feared as greatly the future dangers. The Conful having paffed out of Sammium into the Lucans country, fate down before Numifire, in the very fight of Annibal, and there in a plain encamped himself, not with standing the enemy was possessed before of the hill, and had the vantage of the ground. And for to make the more hew of his own confidence, and how little he feared, he fifth brought forth his men, and marthalled them in order ready tehind battell. Amibal, to soon as he saw the entigns advanced forth of the gates, thaid not behind. And they arranged their battels in such manner, as that the Carthaginian with the right wing took up perced the hill, and the Romans displaced their left wing in length, to the very walk of the towns, Aster, they had continued figure from the third hour of the day unto night, and that the vanguards on both fides were weary with maintaining of skirmith to long: then the first legion of the Romans, with the right wing of their noriement the Spanish fouldiers also of Annibal his part, the Balearian slingers, likewise, together with the Elephants, began the fight, whiles the rest were already in hot conflict, and close together. For a long time the fight shaunk not of any hard. The fift legion of the Romans was seconded with me the coming in of the third: and among the the third with the the third came in new fouldiers that were lufty in place of the toiled and wearted. Whereby, of a linguing and long skirmish there begen all on a fueleng newshot, and cruell battell by reason that like it confriges were fire this and their bodies in heart. Besthe night parced the fray and left the victory do withink in the modifi. When the Nucerines and Acertains made most that they wanted place of habitation, foral-flest. muchas Acerra was in part burnt, and Nuceria utterly razed and deftroyed : Marcellus referred them over to the Senat of Rome, and fent them thither. The men of Acerra had leave granted to re-editie again their own edifices which were burned! But they of Nuceria, according to their own defire, were trinflated to Arella and the Atellans commanded to remove unto Calatta, there to dwell.

Amidst the managing of many and weighty affairs; which falling out variably, one while well; another while ill buried and ampled the hinds of affeir yet the Romans forgot not the Cattle of Tarentum: for M. Militarius the Conful, called by the forefaid letters of the Senate, after he had recommended to charge of the Province and the Armyunto Ciscise the Prator; and fent M.Valerius Mallala the Admiral of the Navy, with a certain number of thips into Affrick as well to tetch in prizes. Be so clay and learn what the people of Carthage did and went about : himfelt with sen fail took the feas, and having a prosperous fore-wind arrived at Rome, And being come, presently he affemthe least, and naving, a propertion for the acts and deeds, he had performed in his Province; name, y, "Whereas for the space almost of three cope years, there had been war in Sicily both by land "and sea," and the same often times foughe with great loss, and many desease; that he now had hrought those troubles to an happy end, and set the Province in quiet. That there was not in all " Sicily one Carthaginian left; nor one Sicilian, of all them that for lear had been chased and drier ven out from thence, but was returned and there replanted; that they were all brought home t " again to their own Cities to inhabit, to their own lands, to plough and fow; that now at last "the fore-let and waste ground was husbanded again, and madefruitfull, not only for the profit "and commodity of the occupiers and tenants thereof, but also for the most affured relief and su-Gentation of the people of Rome, both in war and peace. After this, Mutines, and the reft who had delerved any thing well of the City of Rome, were brought into the Senat: unto whom, both all and some (for the credit of the Consul, and to disgrace him of his promise unto them) there were rendred all forts of honourable recompence. Mutines also was enfranchised Citizen of Rome, and a Bill was preferred in that behalf to the people, by the Tribune of the Commons, and with the grant and authority of the Senate.

During these affairs at Rome, M. Valerius Meffala arrived in Affrick with a fleet of 50 fail and K being landed one morning before day, inddenly and unawates to the people of the country, made a rode into the territory about Wica: and having forraged it far and near, taken many men and women prifoners, and raifed a great booty of all lorts of things befides, returned to the Armalo, and croffed the feas back for Sicily, and arrived again at Litybaum upon the thirreenth day after he loofed from thence, and took the feas first. .A. fort, which by lot had the pterogative of giving their first voices, elected for Confuls De Miller and Q. Fabigu: unto whole election no doubt; the refreshibes called forth in right con and lawfull order would have enclined, but that C. and L. Ariani, the Tribunes of the Commons came between with their negative voice: who faid, it flood not well with civility, that one man should continue ever ftill ir Magistracy, and besides, that it was a more shattefull example and foul precedens; that himself should be created Consul, who affers bled the election: and therefore, if the Dictator would admit of his own name, and allow himself eligible, they would not suffer the affembly to continue any longer: but if there might be fome other propounded befides him. they would not hinder the proceedings thereof until all was finished. "The Dictator alledeed B " in the behalf of the election, and maintained the cause by the authority of the Senat, by the "grant and act of the Commons, and by fundry examples of former times. For when Cn. Servilius was Conful, at what time as Flaminiat the other Conful was flain at Thrasmenus: by order signanted out of the Senat, there was a bill preferred to the Commons, and the same passed by "their voices, That fo long as the war continued in Italy, it might be lawfull for the people to schule and create Confuls again, as often as they pleased, wholoever they would, out of the "number of them that had been Confuls. And as for examples (quoth he) in this cale, I can al-Eledge both old and new: to wir, long ago E. Postbumini Megillus being Interrex, was even in that very election which he called and held created Conful himself, with Co. Jan. Bubulcus: and "of latter daies Q. Fabins likewise, who verily would never have accepted of the Confulship, and C "fuffered it to be hung upon him to continually, if he had deemed it to be against the good of "the common-weal. After much debate and long alteration, entertained with findry like specches, at length the Dictator and the Tribunes agreed to this point; and agreed of this iffue, That they would stand so the award and judgment of the Senat. The LL. of the Senat were all of this mind, that the present condition of the common weal required no less but that the stare and the affair s thereof should be managed by old and experienced Captains and Generals, and such as were skilfull in feats of arms, And therefore they neterly milliked that the election should be himdred and disturbed. Thus the Tribunes relented, and the election went forward and was finished. So there were declared Confuls, Q. Fabius Max, the fift witte, Q. Fulvius Flaces the third time. Then were created Pratoss L. Votarius Philo J. Denmine Cripinal C. Hofstin Tabulus and C. An-Demonlesses. When the Magistates were sheet elected for dispears Q. Now when Q. Fabine Mar, was Conful the fifth time, and Q. Fabius, those in Herraria, which were commanded by C. Calphurnius. The City army was appointed to succeed those Legions in Hetraria and C. Calpharnius was ordained rollt in the government of that Province, and to have the leading of that army which Q. Fulvius had, It was agreed moreover, that T. Quinsins thould be Lord Prefident of Capun; and have the charge of the army there. And that C. Hoftlins flould receive the jurisdiction of C. Lestorius the Pro-Prator, over the province at Ariminum, and likwile his army Unto M. Marcellus the fame legions were allowed, wherewith he had warred to fortunatly when he was Conful Unto M. The Tribunes, who were to moderate this question, gave their judgment thus, That if a thing were to reclet, and discontinued through the stiprine negligence of some Flamins, it was world for themselves and they deemed it no reason, that it should hart or prejudice the whole priesthood. Whereupon, the Prattor himself forced not greatly upon the point, not stood much with him, and so they admitted the Flamin into the house with great consens of the Nobles, as well as of the Commons. And all men thus conceived of it. That the Flamin had obtained the thing, rather in regated of his sanctimony and holines of life than in the right of his sacredorall dignity.

The Confuls before that they went into their Provinces, enrolled two legions of Citizens, for to supply and make up sufficiently the defect of all the other forces. The old City army Fulvius the Conful committed unto C. Fulvius Fluccus his Lieutenant, (and brother he was besides to the Conful) for to be led into Hetruria; with direction, that the Legions already in Hetruria should be brought to Rome. And Fabius the Conful caused the residue of the army of Fulvius to be fought up and rallied, which arose to the number of 3 $36: and commanded his son Q. Maximus to lead them into Sicily, unto M. Valerius the Pro Conful, and of him to receive the charge of two Legions, and the thirty galliaces aforefaid, bearing five ranks of oars. The withdrawing of these Legions out of the Mand, nothing diminished nor abridged the garrisons of that C Province, either in strength or shew. For besides the two old legions, well and sufficiently filled and furnished, he had a great power, as well horse as soot, of Numidians, such as were fled from the adverte part unto the Romans: and took up and levied besides for new souldiers, even those Sicilians also, who had been of the army of Epicides and the Carthaginians, men of approved valour, and skilfull warriors. These forrain aids, when he had put to each of the Roman legions, he kept fill the form of two compleat armies, With the one he gave order to L. Cincius to defend that part of the Island which had been the Realm of King Hiero; with the other be maintained the rest of the Island, divided sometimes by the confines of the Roman and Punick dominions. There was a fleet also rigged and trimmed, confifting of seventy ships, for to guard and defend all the maritine coasts, along the tract of the sea side. Himself in person, with the horsemen of Musines, rode about all the Province, for to visit the lands and grounds, and to take note which were tilled and well husbanded, which lay forelet and untilled, and to commend or chastife and rebuke the landlords and owners thereof accordingly. The care and regard of corn, thus far forth did good; that the Province was able both to fend good store to Rome, and also to convey unto Catana sufficient to maintain the army that was to lie in standing Camp that summer about Tarentum.

But the fouldiers who were transported over into Sicily (and for the better part they were Latines and other Affociats) were like to cause a great rising and commotion: whereby we may fee, that of small occasions and beginnings oftentimes arriegreat matters of important confequence. Therefore they were best to return again speedily to " into their leveral Colonies and to confult with their neighbors & countrimen, whiles the matefter remained yet all whole, as men who had rather let fall tome words rashly at adventure, than " resolved indeed to attempt and commit so hainous an act: yea, and to tell them, and put them in mind that they themselves were neither Campans nor Tarentins, but meer Romans, from them "descended, and of their race; from thence sent as Colonies into the lands that were won by conquest, for to breed, increase, and multiply; and to admonish them, That whatsoever duties " children owe to their parents, the same they owed unto the Romans, if there remained in them "any kind and naturall affection, any remembrance of their ancient native country; and to ex-"hort them to confider better of the matter, and to lay their heads together anew. For a much as "those designments of theirs tended to betray the State and Empire of Rome, and to deliver the I "victory of all unto Ann.b.al. When the Confuls one after another had dealt and been in hand with them a long time in this manner; and the Embassadors nothing moved with their words. made answer again, That neither they knew what other message to bring home; nor their Senat what new counsell to take; fince that they had not any more men to be mustred for souldiers. nor money to be paid for wages: the Confuls feeing them to fliffly and obflinatly bent, made relation thereof before the Senat, whereupon every man was fricken into fo great fear and trouble of mind, that many of them gave out, that the Empire of Rome was come to an end. The like, fav they, will the rest of the Colonies do, and surely all our confederates and allies are combined and agreed to betray the City of Rome unto Annibal. But the Confuls comforted the Senat, and bad them be of good chear faying, That all the other Colonies besides would continue loyall and fast K in their duty and alleageance: and even those also which had failed in their obedience, if there might be Embassadors tent amongst them, to rebuke and chastise them, and not to speak them fair and entreat them by way of prayer, would no doubt have a sespective reverence of the majefly of the Roman Empire. Now when the LL of the Senat had committed the ordering of this matter wholly unto them for to manage and handle, according as they should think good for the weal-publike: after they had throughly founded the hearts and minds of all the reft of the Colo-nies, they called and cited all the Embaffadors, and demanded of them whether their fouldiers were in readinels, according to the capitulations of the covenant. Then M. Sextilius of Fregella made answer in the behalt of eighteen of them, "That not only their souldiers were readyacec cording to the form of the covenant, but also if more were needful more they would allow, and L "what loever elle the people of Rome imposed upon them, and wished them to perform the same "would they ftrain themselves to do to the utmost : for, as yet they had people flore, and a purse "good enough : and as for their heart, it was much better than their ability. The Confuls after they had made a short speech unto them by way of a preamble, saying, that they thought it not fufficient for their defert to be commended from their mouth only, unless all the LL, generally in the Senat-house gave them condign thanks with one voice and common accord, willed them to follow after them thither. The Senat having thanked them in as honourable terms as they could possibly devise, and entertained them with most gracious words, gave order to the Confuls, to bring them forth also in the face of the whole people of the City : and before them, among other fingular favors and kindnesses which they had shewed both unto them and also un. M to their ancestors, to make rehearfall of this late good defert of others, which they afforded unto the Common-wealth: to the end, that now also, after so many ages and lives of men past they should not be forgotten and buried in silence, nor defrauded of their just praise and due commendation. And these were they that remained true hearted and fast unto the City of Rive: The Signing, Nolans, and Norbans; the Satriculans, Brundufins, and Fregellans; the Lucerins, Venuines, and Adrians; the Firmans and inhabitants of Ariminum. And from the other lea fide the Pontians, Pestans, and Costans: and of mid-landers, the Beneventhus, Effernins, Spoletins, Placentins, and the Inhabitants of Cremona. Upon the aid and succour of these Colonies, the Roman state at this time rested and stood maintained: and these all were highly thanked both in the Senat, and in the affembly of the people. As for the other twelve Colonies, which N had refused to do their obedience, the LL of the Senat gave express commandment that they should not be so much as once minded or named and that the Confuls should neither give them their dispatch, nor retain them fill, nor so much as speak unto them. This filent kind of xebuke without word giving, seemed to stand most with the majesty and grandeure of the people

Whiles the Confuls were diligent in providing and making ready all other things requifice and meet for the wars, it was thought good to bring abroad the vicefimmy gold [to wit, the twentieth part of all their tributes and revenues which had been laid up and referved apart in amore fecret closet of the City-chamber, against an hard winter (as they say) to serve for what need server the Common-wealth should stand in. So there was taken forth sour thousand pound weights of gold, whereof three hundred pound was given to the two Confuls apiece, and fo likewife to M. Marcellus, and P. Sulpitius the Pro-Confuls : and to L. Verurnus the Prator, unto whole lot the Province of France befell, And Fabius the Conful had an addition befides himself above the rest of one hundred pound weight of gold for to be carried into the Caftle of Tanentum. The reft of the gold they disburied for to make ready paiment down upon she nail unto them that undertook to provide apparrel for the army in Spain, which to their own fame, and the honour of their General, ferved there in the wars.

A Moreover, it was thought good, that before the Confuls departed into their Provinces the prodigious rokens should be purged and expiate. On the Alban mount there were smilted with fire from heaventhe Image of Jupiter, and a tree standing near unto the Temple: likewise the lake at Hoffin; the wall at Capua, and the Church of Fortune : and at Sinne ffa the wall and gate of the town. Thefe, I say were, blasted with lightning, and smitten with thunderbolts. There were some also brought word, that the water at Alba ran bloud, And at Rome within the fanctuary of the chappel of Fors Fortuna, a little image that flood upon her coronet, fell of its own accord from the head of the goddefs into her hands, And at Privernum it was for certain reported and known of a truth, that an Oxe spake, and that a Vulture of Gripe flew into a shop in the market place, B when it was full of people. And at Simies fa there was an Infant born of doubtfull sex, between male and female, (which the common fort call Androgynos, as for the most partereek names, admit more easie composition of two words than the Latine) and there it rained milk, and a manchild was born with an Elephants head. These strange and seafull signs were expiate, and satisfaction made for them with greater factifices: and a folenin procedion in all the Churches and Chappels, with prayers and supplications was proclaimed for one day. Besides, a decree was granted, that C. Hostilius the Pratot should vow and set out the games and plaies of Apollo, in such manner as of late years they had been vowed and let forth. About the same time of Fulvius the Consul held an affembly for the creation of Censors, and elected Ceniors were M. Cornel, Cethegus, and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, who neither of them had

C ever had been Coss. And by a grant or commission from the Senat, there was a bill preferred unto the Commons, and the fame passed, that these Censors should set, and to farm let the territory of Capua. The review of the Senat and choice of new Senators was hindred and staid, by rea on of a contention between the two Ceniors, who should be the president of the Senat. Now the choosing of him lay in Sempronius his hand. Howbeit Cornelius alledged, that the custome and tradition of fore-fathers should be followed, namely, to elect him for President, who of all them that were now living, had born first the office of Ceptor. And that was T. Manlins Torquatus. Sempronius replied again, and faid, that is the gods had given him by lot the first place, so they had granted him free liberty to choose whom he would. at Canufium. Now was Annibat in hand with the Canufius, and follicited them to revolt. But u hearing once that Marcellus approached he dislodged from thence. The country thereabout was plain and open, without any covert places to bellow an ambush, and to lay trains in therefore he heran to retire himself from thence into the woodland parts, Marcedus tracked him fill, and followed him hard at heels, and encamped close unto him: and ever as he had fortified and enerenched himself, he brought forth his men into the field, ready for battel. Annibal entertaining small skirmishes with certain Cornets and troops of horsemen, and with light appointed footmen, that lanced darts and javelins, thought it not necessary yet to come unto a pight set battel and venture all upon one throw. Howbeit he was drawn to a fight maugre his head how loever he laboured to avoid it. For being gone afore one night, Marcellus overtook him upon a plain and open ground and as he was pitching his tents he kept him from fortifying, by charging his pio- I ners and labourers on every fide. Whereupon they came to a very battell, and fought with all the forces they had on both fides: and when it grew toward night, they departed afunder on even hand; but before it was dark they had encamped not far one from another and in great halfe made shift to fortifie themselves. The next morning by day light Marcellus came forth into the field with all his power: neither refused Annibal the challenge, " having with many words comforted " and encouraged his fouldiers to remember Thrasymenus and Canna, to cut the comb and bear "down and tame this fell stomack and lusty courage of the enemy; who present still (quoth he) "and feeketh uponus, not fuffering us to march on quietly in our journey, nor to pitch our tents: a giving us no leave to breath our felves, nortime to look about us. If we could draw bloud of him once, and fet him out of the field with " bloud about his cars, he would for ever after fight more quietly, and take better leifure with him. With these and such like comfortable words and effectuall remonstrances they were well animated; as also provoked seeing themselves thus molested by the enemy, who day by day never ceafed to challenge and brave them fill: whereupon they began a fierce and cruell battell. They had now continued fight above two hours, and then began the Roman Cavalry from the right wing, and the extraordinary fouldiers that flanked the main battell, to give ground and difmarch. Which Marcel, perceiving he brought forward the eighteenth legion in the vanguard, And whiles some retreated back fearfully, others come forward but slowly, the whole battell was put out of order, and disarrayed; and so at length it was discomfited; and for that fear surmounted shame, I they turned their backs and fled away amagin. A were loft, them he degraded in this manner: He canfed them to be difarmed, and their skeins to be drawn naked and taken from them, and so let them go and shake their ears. And withal, he made proclamation, that the next day they should all present themselves in readines, as well footmen as horiemen. Which done, he difmiffed the audience, and they all confessed and acknowledged, that they were justly and worthly thus checked and rebuked: and that there was not that day one man in the Roman army, fetting affecthe General himfelf only, but he was bound to make amends and fatisfaction, either with spending heart-blood, or atchieving a noble victory. The morrow after they all shewed themselves upro him in their armor, and wel appointed, according to his commandment. The General commended them for their forwardnes: and gave them to understand, that he wond set those in the forefront of the vanguard, which the day before be-B gan to run away, as also those cohort likewise that lost their enigns. And now he gave them warning, and charged them all to fight it out luffly, to win the field: and to endeavour and firain themselves, both all and some, that the news of yesterdayes slight came not to Rome before, and prevented the fame of this dayes victory. Then he willed them to go to their meat and to firengthen their bodies: that in case the fight should hold long; they might be able to endure to the end, Now when all was faid and done, that might encourage and fiir up the hearts of fouldiers, they went out & advanced their enfigns into the field. Annibal being advertised hereof, "Now believe "me (qd, he) we have to deal with an enemy indeed, who is of that nature, that he can neither "brook his good fortune, nor away with bad. If he hath won at any time, he purineth those whom "he hath vanquished, cruelly. Contrary-wise if he have lost, he beginneth to fight with the con-C " querors again right freshly. Then he commanded the trumpers to sound, and brought forth his power in battel array. A field was fought there on both hands more (harply a good deal, than the day before. The Carthaginians strived to keep the honor and reputation of yesterdayes service the Romans frained to wipe away the ignominy and shame of that dayes foil. On the Romans side, the Cavalry of the left wing; and those cohorts which had lost their enfigns, fought in the vanguard, and the twentieth legion was marshalled and ranged in the right point of the battel. L. Cornelius Lentulus; and C. Claudius Nero had the leading of both thele wings, M. Marcellus himself commanded the main battel, and withal his personal presence encouraged them, as a witness of their valour and courage. Now, when as the fight had continued long, and the victory enclined no ways Auxibal commanded the Elephants to be pur forth upon the very forefront of the bat-Does, to see if that object might possibly work some terror and confusion among the Romans. And art the fift they disorded the ensigns and troubled the ranks; so as pirely by treading under soot, and partly by drattering them for fear, that were all about, they had laid naked and open the batter in one parts and in more places than so had the Romans fled but that C. Decinias Elavus, a Colombia state of the control of the c nel, having from the first band of the Hastati, caught up the banner in his hand, commanded the company thereto belonging to follow him; and thitherheled them where the forefaid Elephants were gathered round, and made fouleff work, and charged them to fling their darts and javelins at were garnetee round, and made round work, and en arged mem to ming their darts and javenns at them. All this thot light fure, and miffed their not, yes, and fome fluck in them; and no marvel, for the beafts were near at haid, the bodies great and flamfing thick in a plump together. But as they were not all wounded, fo they that had the darts deflat in their backs and fides, were as ready (such is their nature, dangerous to meddle withal) for to him their own matters, as the enemies: and all turned upon their fellows that were unfinit; and drave them back. So as now, not mies: and all turned upon their fellows that were unburt; and drave them back. So as now, not that entire band only, but every fouldier elfe for his own part, who was able to reach the herd (as it were) of the Elephanes at they field, did his belt to lance Javelins and hort darts it here. Q. Fabius the Conful, won by affault a Town in the Salentins countrey called Mandaria: Prijoners were taken there 4000, and fomegood flore of other pillage. From theme he went to Tarentum, and in the very mouth of the haven, lay against the City. Those ships which Livius had for to wast the convoy of victuals, he partly charged with engins, and other ordnanceto affault Towns withal, and partly furnished with artillery, with stones, and shot of all sorts: the thips of burden likewife, and not the Gallies only which were guided by oars; to the end, that fome might bring Engins and Ladders unto the walls, and others aloof from out of the ships. wound and hurt those that defended the City. These ships were ordained and appointed from the open Sea to affault the City. And clear was the Sea of all danger from the Punick navy, which I was fent unto Corerra, at what time as Philip minded to affail the Etolians. In this mean while, the affailants of Canlonia, a little before the coming of Annibal, for fear left they should be firprifed betook themselves to a little hill; which as it was (for the present danger) a place of safety, fo it wanted all things else. Fabius, as he lay at fiege about Tarentum, was much helped to the atchieving of a matter of great importance, by a trifling thing to speak of, and of small moment in it self. The Tarentins had a garrison of the Brutians, sent from Annibal to defend the City. The Captain of this garrison was greatly enamoured and ready to die for the love of a woman, who had a brother that ferved in the army of Fabius the Conful, He being certified by letters from his fifter, of this new acquaintance that the had with that for rainer and stranger, so wealthy and so honorable a person among his country-men; conceived some hope by means of his fifter, that # her lover might be brought to any thing, and wrought as they would : and so acquainted the Conful with his conceited hope. And this feemed no vain imagination, Whereupon the young man was sent to Tarentum in habit and quality of a sugitive, and by the mediation of his sister. grew into tome favour with the Captain aforefaid : and at first practifed secretly to underfeel and found his mind and afterwards feeing the weakness and inconstancy of the man, he prevailed with him fo much, through the flattering speeches and allurements of the woman, as to betray the keeping and guard of that place whereof he had the charge; After that the manner how, and the time when this plot should be put in execution, was agreed upon, the said souldier was let out of the City closely by night in a place between the corps de guard, and informed the Conful what was done already, and in what fore every thing was to be done. Fabius at the first watch, after behad L given a token and watchword to them in the Caffle,, and to those likewise that had the keeping of the haven, himself fet a compais about the faid haven, and lay as closely as he could to that part of the City which lieth to the East. Then all at, once the trumpets founded from the Castle, from the haven and thips, which in the open Sea rid neer at hand. Great houting there was and much ado on set purpose from all these quarters, whereas, indeed there was least danger or noneat all there. In the mean feason the Conful kept his men.in, Whereupon Democrates, who had beforetime been Admiral of the Armado, and whose chance it was to have the guarding of that place, against which the Conful lay close, seeing all thereabout quiet enough, and no firring at all, and hearing all other parts to ring again and refound, with fuch alarms as otherwhiles it feemed the City was taken and won, and fearing left if he fat fill and bestirred not himself, the Consul would m make some Camilado, and give the aslay to enter the City with banner displaced ; withdrew his guard toward the Castle, from whence was heard the greatest and most terrible noise; "Fabini, when he perceived once by gueffing at the time; as also by the filence it felf in that place (for where but a while before they kept much ado, railing up one another, and calling to arm, there now all was husht and not a word that the guards were had away from thence, he commanded that the ladders should be brought to that side of the wall, where the brocher & broker both of the tresion, had brought word that the cohorts of the Brutians were quartered and kept their goard, Thus on that part was the wall won by the means of the Brutii, who were ready to helpandtake them up, and to they got over into the City. Then was the next gate broken open, that the arm might come by companies under their feveral colonia, Whereupon they fet up a shom and sinte N before break of day, they marched as far as into the market flead, and met, with none to make head against them, and caused all them that fought at the Castle and the haven, to turn monthem. There, in the very entrance of the market place, began a great skirmith, rather fought horisthan maintained thorowly. For the Tarentin couldiers, were nothing comparable to the Romans, elther in courage of heart, or goodness, of armour; in still and knowledge of war, or in luftiness and freingth of body. And therefore when they had ently those their datts even before they same to handlinokes, they turned back and llambaway through the lanes of the City, where mini they were well acquainted some to their own home, and some to their friends houses. Two of their Caprains, Nico and Democrates, fought manfully, and were flain. Philomenet, who was the principal head that wrought the revolt unto Annihal fled out of the skirmish as fast as ever his fortewould Q carry him: but a while after his empty horse was seen & known wandering aftray in the City, but his body could never be found. It was commonly believed, that he flung himfelf headlong from his horieback anto a certain open pit As for Cartholo Captain of the Punck garrison, he call away his armour and weapon, and as he, was coming to the Conful with a goodly tale, recounting and remembring his fathers friendlhip and impercamment to the Romans, there hapned a souldier to meet him and finite off his head. The army of the Carthaginians next unto them was under the conduct of Afdrabal. neerunto the City Bernla. Before his camp, he kept certain ftanding guards of horsemen. Unon them the light streed forlors hope of archers and datters of the Roman hoft which went before the battail to skirmith, likewife they of the forefront and wanguard, charged forcibly with their thor; yet fo contempts outly, and in (comful wife, even presently upon their travail in journey, and before they had chofen a peece of ground to encamp in that it was foon feen what heart there was in both parts. For the Cavalay of the enemies fearfully fled, and were driven into the camp: [but the Romans advanced with between definated hard southe very gates: and fo for that day their Homacks were only up and provoked to a fight, and then the Romans pitched their tests. Afdrahel in the night retired his armyte discent, which in the top had a broad plain. Behind this hill there can a river the fore-front chareof, and the federal habout the skirts were compafied as it were with a steep hank standing pluish apright. There lay under this hill top another plain lower than the other, which also was enclosed cound about with the like bank, as difficult for ascent as the former. The next day Afdrabal, after the faw the enemies standing arranged before their camp, fent down his Namidian-horsemen, the right across I landers also of the Balears and like wife the Africans, "Then Scipie tode about all the regiments, enfigns, and ranks of his army, "marshalled as they Road in battail wife, and shewed unto them their enemies, how they de M (fpared afore-hand to fight on equal and even ground how they taking the vantage of the hills, "braved and the wed themselves, prefuming and trusting upon the place, and not upon their own "valour and firength of arms. And not only the fouldiers but lackies and hore-boyes, & find as followed the tamp, were intermingled amongs the armed companies. And albeit the aftent up the hill was bard, and they were pelved and absorb overwhelmed with O dans and flones, yet being to insued as they were to chara wale and reference with a little y in up fifth to the ton; and to foom as they had got formen en ground; where they might have fire footing they found the enemy, who, was light and nimble, and able some to and fround to fave him felt, and fairt well, when he was fanell, all the same that they sharm should be of and plaid upon one mother with light thore, now that they came cordain fight, and for them. Protect, not oble to fland his ground: and for they drawn burnfrom his place, and with great flanguer chafteling and

mandment to these, for co follow on the train of their victory, and to enter up fill upon the main battel of the enemies, parted the reft of his forces, together with Lelius, willing him to coast along and wheel about on the right hand of the mount, until he found tome way of easier afcent himfelf on the left hand, fetched no long circuit and compais, until he came cross overthwart the flank of the enemies. Herenpon fift began their battel to be difordered, whiles they were defirous to turn their wings, and to oppose their ranks and squadrons against the noises and shouts which rang every where about them. In this tumultuous troible, Letins allo was got up-s and while the enemies drew backward and gave ground, because they would not be charged behind on their back, the vanguard of their part was displayed and lay open; and so the Romans even of the mid-B die battel alfo, had a lane and spacious room to get up and enter upon them: who never had been able to have gained the ground, and won the plain above, (confidering the disadvantage of the fleep bank) fo long as the ranks had flood unbroken, and the Elephants were opposed against them before the Ensigns, in the forefront, Down went the enemies now on every ide, and were pireoully killed: and Scipio, who with his left wing encountred the right, charged and plaid especially upon the naked sides of the enemies. And so by this means they had no way left them to flie and escape clear. For the Roman guards on both hands, as well on the left as the right, had beiet all the passages. And as for the gate of the camp, the General himself, and the other Captains and officers of the Camp, had taken it up as they fled that way: befides the comberfome trouble of the Elephants, whom being now affrighted, they feared no less then their ene-C mies. So there died of them 8000, Afdrabas, who before the conflict had made fure work with all the money, and taken it with him, fent the Elephanis before, and having rallied as many as he could, of them that fled and escaped out of the camp, he made haste along the river Tagus, toward the mountain Pyrenaus. Scipio being now mafter of the enemies camp, after he had given to the fouldiers all the pillage and spoil, but only the prisoners, such as were freemen when he came to take the number of the captives, found they were ten thousand footmen, and two thousand horse. Of which number, as many as were Spaniards he see at liberty and sent them home withour ranfom. But as for all the Africans, he commanded the Treasurer to make money of them. Then the whole multitude of the Spaniards, as well those that before had yeelded themselves, as they that were taken prisoners the day before, saluted him with great consent and general voice, D by the name and title of King. Whereupon Scipio, after filence made by the crier, aid, "That he "took the name of "L. General or Commander, to be the greatest of all other names, by which "toprotes 4 his own fouldiers used to call him. As for the title of King, how foever in other places it was great and honorable, at Rome surely, it was odious and intollerable. For his own part, the mind indeed he carried of a King, and if they deemed it to be the highest honour that can fall to the "nature of man, let them judge to in their own hearts fecretly, and please themselves with that "file: only he wished them to forbear the word and term thereof. These very Spaniards, as barbarons as they were perceived by this peech how haughty and magnanimous he was, who in the height of spirit contemned that as a base thing, wherear in admiration only of the very title, all mortal menbesides are amazed and astonied. After all this, he bestowed upon the Princes and great Potentats of the Spaniards, jupdry gifts, And of the hories, whereof he had taken in the field and campgreat flore, he gave Indibite the choise of three hundred where he would. When the treasurer was selling the Affricans, according to the Cremeral his commandment, his happed upon a young springal and stripling, of rare and singular beauty; and bearing that he was of toyal bloud, he sent him to Scipia. And when Scipia demanded of him who he was, and what country man. and wherefore at thole years he was in camp among midefouldiers: "I am (faith he) a Numidian

Within few dayes after the battel at Berula, when as Scipio in his return to Taracon, was gone H past the chase or forrest of Castulo: Afdrubal the sonos Gigo and Mago, the two Generals, arrived out of the farther province of Spain unto Afdrubal the ion of Amilcar. But they came a day after the fair, and too late to help an overthrow past already: yet in very good time, to give counsel for the managing and executing of the war behind. There, as they conferred together concerning the disposition of the Spaniard, and how they stood affected in the countries of each province, only Afdrubal the fon of Gifgo was of opinion, and perswaded, That the utmost tract and coast of Spain, which lieth upon the Ocean and Gades, was hitherto unacquainted with the Romans, and therefore fast enough and fure to the Carthaginians. But the other Afdrubal and Mago, were of another mind, and agreed in this, That Serph with his favours and benefits had possel, fed the affections and hearts of all men already, both in general, and also in particular, and that there would never be an end of fliding from them, and fiding to the Romans, before that all the Spanish souldiers were either removed into the farthest parts of Spain, or conveighed over into France. And therefore albeit the Senat of the Carthaginians had not granted out any such act and commission, yet there was no remedy, but that Asarabal must go over into Italy, where Annibal was the head of the war, and in whom lay the main chance of all by which means also he might withdraw out of Spain all the Spaniards, far enough from the naming and hearing of Scipio, For Aldrubal his army, as well by daily falling away and revolting to Scipio, as also by the late defeat much empaired, was to be replenished again with new souldiers. Moreover, that Mago should deliver his army to Aldrubal the son of Gifes, and himself in person cross over into the Balcar K Islands, with a great fum of money, to wage new aids and succours from thence. And that Aldrubal the son of Gilgo, with his army should retire farther up into Portugal, and not encounterthe Romans at all in any hand. And that out of all the Cavalry there should be chosen out the very flower and strength, to the full number of 3000, for Masaniffa, and that he should range and overrun all the hither Province of Spain, partly to help the distressed Allies, and partly to spoil the enemies towns, and forrage their lands. After these orders and directions set down, the Generale departed afunder to the execution of these determined designments. Thus yesee what were the affairs and occurrences of Spain for that year.

At Rome the fame of Scipio grew greater every day then other. Fabius for the winning of Tarentum, albeit he gat it rather by craft and policy, then by force and vertue, was glorious therefore. I The name of Fulvius began to age and decay, Marcellus grew also into an ill name and some obloquy, both for that at fifth he had a foil, and also because he suffered Annibal to range over Italy at his pleasure, and himself at mid-summer had retired his souldiers to Venusia to take up there (as it were) their winter quarters. He had a fore advertary in the City, one C. Publius Bibulus, a Tribun of the Commons: who from the very firthinge of that discomfiture, with continual speeches and Orations brought Claudius into harred and inlamy with the common people, and now was in hand with them to deprive him of his government. How beit, the friends and kinsfolk of Claudius obtained thus much, That Marcellus leaving his Lieutenant at Venulia, should repair to Rome for to make his purgation, and acquir himself of such crimes as his advertagies objected and laid against him; and that during his absence, they should not treat nor debate about his deprivation. It happied much about one time, that both Marcellus came to Rome (to meet with the shamefulflander that fan on him, and to lave his honour) and also Q. Fulvius the Conful, about the new election for the year following. The question touching the government of Marcellus, was debated and handled in the lifts or Circus, called Flaminius and a great affembly there was, and much concourse of the Commons, and of people of all degrees and calling. The Tribun accused not Marcellar only, but all the nobility : by whole trandulent practile, and by whole cold and delayist proceedings, it was come to pais, that Annibal now theleten years had remained in Italy (as it were) in his province continually, where he had had led a greater part of his life, then at Contagn is his native country, And now (quoth he) the people of Rome talle the fruit, proceeding of protogning and continuing of government fill in one person. In the eleventh year of the Punick war, M. Marcellus, entred his confulfhip the fifth time (to was living, vou reckon upon that Confulship which he never bare through, because there was an error comm mitted in his creation) and with him T. Quintius Crifpinus. To both Confuls the Province of Italy was affigued, and both armies of the Confuls the former year. There was a third army then at Venusia, whereof M. Marcellus had the conduct. Of these three, they were to chuic two, which they would; and the third remaining, was to be committed unto him, who was by lot to have the government of Tarentum, and the Salentins. The rest of the Provinces were thus divided amonght the Pretors. P. Licinius Varus had the jurisdiction civil, and P. Licinius Crassius (then Pontifex Max.) that of the forraigners, and to go whither toever the Senat should think good to send him, Unto Sex. Julius Cafar betell Sicily, and to Q. Clandius Flamen the City of Tarentum, Q. Fulvius Flaccus had his commission renewed, to continue in government for one year longer; and he was appointed to govern Capua, which had been the charge of T. Quinrius the Pretor, and to have nunder his hand the command of one legion, Likewile C. Hostilius Tubulus remained still in office. and that as Pro-pretor he should succeed C. Calpurnius, and have the conduct of two legions Moleover, L. Veturim Philo had his authority & government confirmed to him anew, that as Propretor he should fit Lord Deputy in the same province of France, and have the same two legions as before, when he was Pretor there. The like decree that was granted for L. Veturius, passed also in the Senat for C. Aurunculeius, and a bill was propounded unto the people for the proroguing and continuance of his office, who as Ptetor ruled the Province of Sardinia with the strength of two Legions. And for the defence and guard of the faid Province he had an addition of fifty thips of war, which P. Scipio had fent out of Spain. P. Scipio likewise and M. Syllanus, held fill, by vertue of a decree their provinces of Spain, and commanded the same armies for one year lonh ger. As for Scipio, he had direction to fend over into Sardinia fifty ships, our of those eight w which he had under his hand, either taken with him out of Italy or won from the enemy at Carthage, because there ran a rumor, that there was great preparation at Carthage for a navy that year, and that the Carthaginians would take up, and fill all the featoast of Italy, Sicily and Sardinia, with an Armado of two hundred fail. In Sieily the government was divided in this manner, Sextus Cafar had the leading of the Cannian amny . M. Valerius Bavinus (for his government also was confirmed for a year longer) the charge of that fleet of leventy thips, which rid about Sicily: with commission so add therto, those thirty ships which the former year lay before Tarentum and with this Armado confifting of one hundred fail, to put over into Africk, if he thought lo good, and there to forrage and fetch booties. Over, and besides, R. Salpitius was for one year longer to Econtinue in office, and to govern the provinces of Macedary and Greece, with the force of the faid Navy which he had before. As touching the two legions which remained about the City of Rome, there was no alteration. Only the Controls were permitted to key and enrol a new supply as need. Should require. yet in the end turned rather to long and chronick difeases, then to sharp and deadly maladies. For me, this pestilence there was not only solemn going in procession, in all the high streets, carrefours, and cross ways throughout the City: but also P. Licinius Varus Preter of the City, was commanded to propound unto the people, that the Playes above aid should be vowed for ever against a fer and determinat day. Himself therefore was the first that vowed them, and exhibited them upon the "third day before the Nones of July, and the same day ever after was observed and kept by holiday for that purpose.

As the rumor of the Arctins revolt encreased dayly greater, so the LL. of the Senat were careful about it every day more then other Letters therefore were lent unto C. Hoftilius, that he should without delay take pledges of the Arentines: and C. Terentius Varro was fent with commission. to receive the faidhostages at his hands, and to bring them to Rome. He was no sooner come, I bot Hostilins presently commanded that one legion, which lay in camp before the town, should enter the City with banner displayed, and there he put sufficient guards in places convenient. Then having called and summoned the Senators to appear in the market place, he demanded of them hostages. And when the Senat requested but two days respit to consider of the matter, he made proclamation, that either they should deliver them presently, or else the next day he would feize upon all the Senators children every one. Then he commanded the Colonels, the Captains of the Allies, and the Centurions, to ward the Gates, that none might go forth of the City by night. But this was flackly and negligently executed, for feven principal Senators, before the warders were fer at thegates, escaped forth with their children before night. The morrow morning by break of day, when the Senat began to be cited into the Common Hall, these parties were k missed, and their goods conficat, and fold in port-sale. Of the rest of the Senators, their children were taken hostages to the number of 120, and were delivered to C. Terentius, for to be conveighed to Rome: who when he was come into the Senat, made such relation of the matter, that the fulpition of their revolt was much more pregnant then before. And therefore, as if some insurrection had like prefently to grow from Tufcany, C. Terentius himself was commanded to conduct one of the two legions about the City of Rome, unto Aretium, and there to lie in garrison withit for to keep the town in order. And it was thought meet that C. Hoftilius with the army besides, should survey and visit the whole Province, and to be careful and circumspect, that no occasion nor opportunity might begiven unto them, that were minded to feek alteration and to rebel. C. Terentius fo foon as he was come to Aretium with the legion, when he called unto the Magi- L frates for the keys of the gates, and they made answer that they were but miscast ande and could not be found; supposing that they were rather cautelously laid out of the way for the nonce, than loft by negligence, canfed other keyes and locks to be made, and fet upon every gate: and took as great heed and care as he could, to have all under his own hand. He gave especial warning also to Hostilins as touching the Tuscans, and told him, that he should never hope to reft in fecurity, that they would not rebel, unless he took order with them aforehand, that they possibly could not rebel.

After this, there was much debate and contention in the Senatabout the Tatentins, even before Fabius, whiles himself excused and desended them whom he had conquered and subdued by force and arms , but others were mightily offended with them, yea, and most of them gave out plainly M that they werefull as faulty as the Campans, and deserved no less punishment. And so there was an act of the Senat granted according to the opinion and advice of M. Acinins, that the town should be held with a garrison, and all the Tarentins kept from firring out of the City: and that the matter should further be debated and decided affeth another time, when the flate of half flood in better tearms of peace and quietness. And the like contention and variance was amon the LL, of the Senat touching M. Livius Constable and Captain of the Castle of Tarentum, while fome were of mind to condemn him as in great fault, because through his carelesness and slott, Tarentum the City was betrayed to the enemy: others again awarded him good confideration and reward, for that he kept the fort fo well by the space of five years, and by his means especially and by none elfe Tarentum was recovered. But foliate were opinion between these and 455, N that the dituming and determination of that matter permined property to the Cenifors and not to the Senat: of which judgement Fabius also himself was. And this moreover he said with a khathe must needs confeis, that true it was, which Livindis friends in the Senat Rood fo much mon and iterated fo often, namely, that he was the only means that Tarenam was recovered if it good faith, quoth he, it never could have been regained if it had not once been loft before;

T. Quintins Cripinus one of the Confuls, went to the army which Q.F. abvins Flactor had with a new supply into the Lucans country. with a supply, nato the army which he had left the year before at Vennsia, When Graffinus minded to affault Loori in the country of the Brutians, because there went a great name of Fabius for the affailing and winning of Tarenson, he sent for all kind of artillery and engine out of Sicily, and ships also were brought from thence, for to batter that part of the City shat lieth to the Sea fide. But the enterprise went not forward, because Annibal had removed, with all his forces to Lacinium. And belides, the news went that his colleague had already brought out his forces from Venusia, with whom he was desirous to joyn. And therefore he returned out of the Brutians country into Apulia: and so between Venusia and Brutia, the Consils encamped (everally, within three miles one from the other. Annibal likewise was tetired into the same country, considering that the war was turned from Lecri. There the Consils (hot men of nature both almost every day led forth their men into the field, not doubting but if Annibal oncementhem (having two Confular armies joyned together) to make a dispatch of the war once for all. Annibal because the year before, he had twice affronted Marcellus, and both given and taken the foil: like as he had great reason, as well to sear as to hope, if he were ro encounter and fight with him alone: To he thought verily, that he was never able to make his part good with both the Confuls together. And therefore laying off his Lyons skin, he took himfelf wholly to his old Foxes coat, and fought all means and opportunities to lay a train for to entrapthem. How beir there passed some light skirmishes between both their camps, with variety of fortune and c interchangeable fincess. By which, the Confuls thinking that they should hold out and keep the enemies play, during the lummer feason, and yet nevertheless be able to affault Lacri, wrote unto L. Cincine, that he should take the Seas, and cross over with his fleet out of Sicily to the City of Lord. And to the end that the Town might be likewife affailed from the Land fide, they commanded part of the army which lay in garrion at Tarenum, to be conducted thither. Aniibal having intelligence afore-hand of their things, by certain Thurins, sent forth certain of his forces to befor the wayes from Tarentum. And there under the fide of the Petellian mount, he bestowed fecretly in ambush two thousand horse, and three thousand foot. Upon whom the Romans (marching without their elpials fent afore them) chanced to light, and were flain to the number oftworkhouland, and upon twelve hundred taken slive: the reit were feattered and fled over the fields and forcefts back to Turentum. Now there was a little hill between both the camps of the Carthaginians and Romans, and the same all overgrown with wood, which at first was posfessed and kept, neither by one nor other: because the Romans knew not the situation of that fide while he toward the enemies camp: and Annibal supposed verily that it was a place fitter for to lay an ambuth, than to encamp in : and therefore he fent by night for that purpole, certain troops of Numidians, and bestowed them closely in the mids of the wood, and not one of them flirred all the day long out of their standings, for fear lest either their armour or themselves might be espect a far off. In the Roman camp, every man generally was of mind, and let not to say, that the iaid hill was to be seized and fortified for their use, with a good fortress built upon it, for fear lest if it were first gained by Annibal, they should have the enemy as it were over their heads ready to annoy them. And Marcellus himself was of the same opinion : whereupon, Why go not we our felves in person (quoth he, to his colleague) with some few horsemen, to view and confider the place, where our eyes shall be our judges; and seeing the ground once, we shall resolve more certainly what counieto take? Crispinus liked well of themotion: and so they went for ward accompanied with two hundred and twenty horiement of which, forty were Fregellans, the reft all Infrans, There followed after them, M. Marcellus, the Conful his fon, and Aulus Maniins, two Colonels: alfo L. Aremins and M. Anlins, two Captains of the allies. Some Authors have fet down is writing, that Marcellus the Col, facrificed that days and when the first beast was killed, the liver was found without an head : howbeit in the fecond; all things appeared that were wont to be feen. But in the head of that liver there shewed I wot not how, a kind of extraordinary exb crescence a which the Southfayer had no liking to, because after those inwards which seemed before (horr, unperfect, and milliking: now those again were feen too well fed and overgrown, But the Consist Marcellus was so hot and desirous to fight with Annibal, that he thought himself ocver encamped neer enough unto him. And even then also as he went forth out of the camp, he gave order to his fouldiers to be ready at a short warning, and have their eye upon the place that presently of he liked the hill, for which they went to view, they should dislodge, truss up bag and baggage and follow prefently. Now there was a little flat and plain ground before the camp, from whence the way that led unto the faid hill, was onevery fide very open and evident to the eye: where there lay a from or fpie, fet of purpose to discover any of the enemies gone far from the camp fireging and ranging abroad either for fewel or forage, that they might be intercepted; and G notion any hope of fogreat effect as fell out/This fellow gave a figuranto the Namidians, the all as once they should arrie out of their lurking of darring holes. Se received the charge of the enemies, encouraging their people, and fighting themfore night vallantly. But when they faw once both their Control wounded, and Management of the charge o the through with the puth of a lance, and falling from his horie ready to die : then they also (and few of them God wot remained alive) regether with the Conful Criffinnic (who was wounded with two javelins) and young Marcellar, who was himself also fore hurt, fled away and escaped These were flain in this skirmish, A. Manline a Colonel, of the two Captains of allies, M. Antui was killed out-right, and L. Arenies taken prisoner. As for the Lictors belonging the Confuls, five of them then fell alive into the hands of the enemies : the reft were put to the fword, or escaped t with the Conful. So there were three and forty horsemen died either in the conflict, or in the flight, and eighteen taken personers. In the camp there was much ado, and crying out fortogo and incour the Coniuls, when they faw one of them, and the other his fon grievoully hurr, and the poor remnant of that unfortunat espedition, coming toward the camp, The death of Marcellss was much pitied and lamented in many other respects, but for this especially: that he, a man of that age (for he was now above three core years old) and who should have had more wit: an old Captain and Leader (Ifay) that should have had more wisedom and forecast, so unadvisedly had brought both his colleague together with himfelf, and also in manner the whole commonwealth 1850 to desperate a danger. I should make much circumstance, and fetch many turns and compates about one point of I would rehearfe all that writers have diverly fet down, as touching K the death of Marcellus. But to let all others go, L. Calius delivereth the thing three manner of wates: the one by hearfay only, and a general report: the other, extant in an Oration of the praise of Marcellas, penned by his own fon, that was himself present at the action: the third, which Calius himself alledgeth upon his own knowledge, and after diligent enquiry into the matter. But howfoerer the voice and fame varieth in fome circumstances, most of them jump in the occasion, That he went forth of the camp to view the place: and all agree of the event, That he was entrapped and fo flain. Annibal improving that the enemies were mightily terrified, as well by the death of the one Conful, as the hurr of the other: because he would take all advantage, and omittee good opportunity offered, forthwith removeth his camp, and pitcheth upon the very hill where he had fought. There he found the corps of Marcellus, and caused it to be enterred.

Criffinus affrighted both at the death of his companion in government, and also at his own hurt received, dillodged in the dead time of the night following, and in the very pest mountains that he could come unto, encamped and fortified himfelf upon an high ground, and furely lented onevery fide. There the two Generals of both parts, beat their brains, and occupied all their wis contriving the one to lay trains, and the other to avoid them. Annibal rogether with the body of Marcellus, had gotten his ring or fign manual. Criffinns fearing that Annibal might practile fome crafty fetch, and beguile some body by the means of that figuret, fent mellengers to all the Gities next adjoyning, giving them notice, that his brother Conful was flain, and that the enemy had gotten his real ring, and warning them, that they thould give no credit to any letters written in his name, or figned with his feal. This mellage was not fo foon brought to Salapia, but freight M after there came letters thither from Annibal, framed and indited in the name of Marcellas to this effect. That he would the next night that immediately followed that prefer day, be in person at Salagia; willing the garrion fouldiers to be in readiness, for to be emploied in some service that should be thought needful. The Salapians perceived whereabout he went, and supposing that it was a perillous plot, whereby Annie of fought fome opportunity to be revenged of them and to punish them, for anger, not only that they were revolted from him, but because they had killed his horlemen: they therefore lending the medenger back again, (who when Romaning rive and renegate, and had fled from them to Annibal) to the dad, that their fouldiers might effect that which they were minded to do, without the knowledge of the messenger, and not be especially him befowed all the Townines along the walls and in fundry convenient places of the Town, N to heep a francing corps deguard. The watch and ward they tended the reax night very carefully. and about that gate where they imposed the enemy would come, they opposed the firength and most able men of all the greaton. Annial near about the time of the relief of the fourth much came so the City. In the vanguard marched cortain Roman Rebels and Renegates, with Roman armor upon them who when they were come to the gate, called up the watch, and peterli in Lasin unto them willing them to let the gates open, has that the Cof. was come. The wathmen making temblance as it they were considered and awakped at their call began to beftir themselves, to make, haft with much ado, as buly as ever they might be. The Pote-collis which had been let down, flood yet that, Than they began, fometo beave, and to weigh it from the ground with leawere & colonicidate setting to draw it up with coperation that beigns that men might go opright o taking in a she gate apare, through who might the port collis burgest it felt down with a mighty neite, sheng got in the core; was the gate and a mighty neite. A with punchion poles, or with darts and javelins flew them. So Annibal caught in his own shares,

He went from thence to levy and raise the sege before Lacri, which Town Cincins beleaguered streightly, and assaulted most forcibly, having raised fabricks about it, and planted all kind of engines, artillery, and ordnance against it, which were brought thither out of Steils. Mage who the first hope of better, when he heard once of the death of Morcellus. And then there came also a mellenger with news, That Annibal having fent afore him the horsemen of the Numidians, followed after himself in person, as fast as be could, with the power of the sootmen. And therefore tower after minima in personal and a second second

B felf at once fet the gate open, and finddainly fallied forth upon the enemy with great violence. At the first the skitmith was doubting more because be came upon them at unawates, than for that he was equal to match them in frength; but afterwards, when the Numidians charged them behas, the Romans were so certified, that they fled here and there in every place to the sea and their ships, leaving their fabricks and engins wherewith they had shaken and battered the walls. So by the coming of Annibal the fiege brake up before Locri.

Crifpinus, after he was advertised that Annibal was gone into the Brutians countrey, commanded Marcus Ma e-llus a . Colonel or knight Marshal, to lead away unto Venusta, the army which had been commanded by his Colleague new deceased. Himself went to Capua with the legions, fearce able to endure the shogging and shaking of the horselitter, for pain and grief of his wounds. C From whence he wrote letters to Rome, giving notice, That his brother Conful was dead, and in what danger himself was ... Signifying also, that he could not himself come unto Rome against the election, because he thought he should not be able to endure the travel of the journey: and befides, he was in great care for Tarentum, left Annibal from out of the Brutians countrey would turn thither with all his power. Moreover, he gave the Senat to understand, that it was requisite there should be fent as Embassadors or Agents unto him, men of wildom and discretion, whom he might confer with, and acquaint with his will and mind, as touching State-matters. The reading of these letters, caused them much to lament and mourn for the death of the one Consul, and greatly to fear what would become of the other. Therefore they not only dispatched $\mathcal Q$. Fabius the fon, unto the army in Venufia, but also fent unto the Consul three commissioners, Sex. Julius D Celar, L. Licinius Pollio, and L. Cincins Aliments, who but a few dayes before was returned out of Sicily. These had in commission to signify auto the Consul from the Senat, that in case he were not able himself to come to Rome against the Election, he should nominat within the Roman territory a Dictator for to affemble the people for the faid Election: alforhat their pleasare was, in case the Coolin went to Tarentum, that Q. Claudius the Pretor should withdraw his legions from there into those parts, whereas he might defend most Cities of the Allies. In the same summer M. Valerius took the Seas, with a sleet of a hundred sail, and from Sieily passed over into Africk; and having disbarked and landed his men neer the City Clupea, washed the country all about, and met no armed men, to speak of, to make head and withfland his invahoo. Then their tovers and fortagers retired in half unto their thips, because on a suddain there was a rymour blown abroad, That the punick Armado was coming, confiling of 83 fail. The Roman Admiral fought fortunatly with them not far from Clapes. And after he had boorded and taken eighteen of their thips and put the rest to slight, he returned to Libbeum; with a rich Lande

Then the King departed from thence, and through This faly and Baotia, came to Chalcis in Eubea, for to put by Attalus (whom he heard lay to be coming with a navy for Eubea) from arriving in any havens, or landing in any place on the lea coult. Then leaving a guard behind for to withitand Actalus, (if haply in the mean feafon he fatuld chance to pais over) he marched himfell forward with some few horsemen and light'armed footmen, and came to Argos. There by the fuffrages and voices of the people, the honour of exhibiting and celebrating the folemn games. called Her ai and Nemei, was recommended unto him because the Macedonian Kings give out & I fax, that they are descended from that City. After he had performed the solemnity of the Hirai. presently he went from the very games and passimes to the Councel of his allies long before proclaimed, as is abovefaid. Much debate there was for a finall end of the Ætolians war, that neither the Romans nor Artalia might have any occasion to come into Greece. But the Ætollans marred all this before the time of the truce was well expired: by occasion that they heard, that Attalue both was come to Egina, and the Roman navy anchored at Naupactum. For being called into the Councel of the Achai, in which the same Embassies were, who before at Phalera had treated for peace, first they complained, that some things had been done, during the time of the truce, against the faith of the covenant and accord, But at last they flatly denied and faid, That there could not possibly be an end of wars, unless the Achai rendred Pylos unto the Messenians; and peace & were granted and restored to the Romans, and likewise to the Athamans, to Scerdiletus, Pleuratus, and Archides. Whereat Philip was very wroth, and thought it a foul indignity, that conquered persons should take upon them to article and capitulat with him their conqueror. "But neither herecofore (quoth he) gave I audience to the treaty of peace, nor yeelded confent to truce un-"on any hope. I had that the Atolians would ever be quiet: but to this end, that all confederate "friends might bear witness that I fought means of peace, and they fought occasions and pickt "quarrels for war. So without conclusion of any peace, he dissolved the Diet; leaving four thoufand fouldiers for the defence and guard of the Achaens, and receiving of them five thips of war, (which if he had joyned to the armado of the Carthaginians, lately fent unto him, and alloto those thips which were coming out of Bithyma from King Prafias, he determined to affailthe L Romans with thip fight, who had a long time been mighty matters of the Seas) himself prelemly from that Councel departed back to Argos for now the time drew neer of the games Name which he was defirous coccelebrate and honor with his prefence. Whiles the King was occupied in the preparation of these games and passimes, and solaced himself during these scaling has been supported by dayes, with more liberty of mind and repose, than he should, in time of war; P. Sulpitim having loofed from Napackam, arrived with his fleet between Sieyone and Corinth; and wasted that goodly teleritory, most renowned of all other for fruitfulness of all things. The noise and rumor of this occurrence awakened Philip, and canfed him to leave his disports: and so he took his Cavalry with him in half, and fet forward, having given order that the Infantry (hould follow fireightafters where he found the Romans stragling here and there all over the countrey, loden with boo- M tyand prizes; (48 who feared nothing in the World less) fet upon them, and drave them to their falses. Thus the Roman fleet nothing well appaid for the booty they had gotten, returned to Naupactum. And Philip greatly augmented the folemnity and magnificence of the games that were behind, by the same of a victory over the Romans at that time, how much or little soe er in was. And witing rear joy and mired were those holy dayes kept faild fo much the more, beame the King for to please the people with all laid and the diadem of his head, put off his purple lobes ambother princely and royal habit and in outward port bare himself equal to others, and no bertes saithing sight acceptable and playing to free States, as nothing can be more. By which deed offines, he had given great and intribulered hope unito all men, of liberty and freedom; but this he frained and maried all again with his into crable luffand too lenels of life. And thus by dehaling him elle to she meanth see one of persons the left he was flitpected and known, the more dispute hubyas: and whiles he pretended who others a vain frew of freedom, he abuted all to his own licensions whether paid his perits for all his pleasifies, nor with flatfling persy alons and fair speeches obveined helps defrees that to accomplifif his wickedness, he filed of centimes for the violence : and dangerous it was both to husbands and parents, to be any thing freight lated, and make it goodly by sedious delay and unleafonable leverity, to feen but to fray the unbridled luft and appetitio of the Ring. Proprose of the Prieses also of the Action rained Armai, he took his wife away called Bolyeratia, and upon Hope and coloni of mariage with the King, drew her away, O with him into Macidon. Having that with thefelewd and wicked pranks passed the time of the folemnity of the Nemean games | and fome few dayes over and above ; he went to Dima for toudificient the garrison of the Atolians, which the had fent for and received into the City [of Drada from the Breans; Cyclinder (who was the foverage or chief magifirat of that flate) and the Achtei met the Kingat Dyme who as they hared the Eleans, because they differed from the reft withe Acharans, forthey were maliciously bent against the Ecolians, whom they were perswaded.

Now waresthey, our man shahis while, that subjectes with fifteen ships had crolled over from the partures to Ciffeen in options the had landed four thousand fouldiers in the fail time of the night (beraufe they, wightingt be feen to match) and entred Elic. And thefetore, this tuddain and unexpected to ject put an enrible bear, when they law and knew some among the Actolistis and B the Elemps, the Roman effigues and their atmor. At the first, the King would have had his men to retire; but siter wards jeeing the shirmids was begun already between the Ætolians and Triballi, (a kind of Illyrians) and perceiving that his fouldiers also were put to it and charged; then the King allo, himfelf with his Horlemen affailed the Conort or Squadron of the Romans. There his Horte was, with a dark fliot throughward when he had once flung and caft the King for ward over his head, there was a cruel and deadly fight on both fides, whiles the Romans laid hard at the Ring, and the Kings men protected and guarded his perion. Himfelf fought right manfully above the reft, confidering be was forced on toos, to maintain skirmlih among the Horfemen. But afterwards, by reaton of the great disadvantage; and beeing many about him triken down and wounded, he was, caught away by his gard, mounted upon another Horfe, and fo he fled and eftaped. C And the fame day the occumped 5 miles from the City of the Eleans. The next morrow be led all his whole power to a Calle of the Eleans fituate neer at hand, called Pyros: into which he had intelligence that a makitude of the country pealants for fear of being thousand, were with their cattail driven and retired. This confined, difordred, and naked company he took captive at his coming, presently upon the first charge and onset that he gave : and with that boory he licked himtelf whole again, and alred the thametal defeat that he had received at Elis. As he was buy in thating the prizes, and dealing abroad the priloners (and there were of men tome four thomand, and of cattail of all kinds one with another exenty thousand head) there came a polt out of Macedown with news, that one Eropus had surprised Lydinidum, by cormpting for a piece of money the Coultable of the Callie, and Captain of the garmon where : and the he held in possession D certain bourough Powns of the Datiaretians, and full sailed the Dardanians to Rebellion. The King therefore gave over the Achaan and the Atolian wars : yet leaving two thouland five hundred, armed fouldiers of all forts; under the leading of the hippur and Polyphanies for to detend his Allies, he went from Dyme through Mebaie, Bubitapand Bebets; and open the reach day came to Demetrias to Teleffalia. Where where medengers also encountred him, bringing tidings of agreater infurrection; namely, that the Dardsoians had invaded Macesony, and were mafters of Oreflies, and came down into the plains of Effrance; and that the inmor was rife and went currant, among the barbarous people that Panip was flain. The truth is, in that expedition wherein he fought at Syepen with those that presed and made spoil in the country; he was carried by his

hot and thomack-tule Hoxfe under a Troff, and there against a bough or arm thereof that stood E out, he chanced to break a corner of the creft of his beliner at one end. That piece chanced to be found by a certsin Atolian, and was brought into Atolia unto Scorddesse, who knew by the mark that it was the Kings helmeer whereupon the fame of the Kings death was divulged comminently abroade ; After the departure of Philip out of Achaa, Sulpition who was arrived with his navy at eleginas work forward; and joyned with Metalas. above all others by many degrees, G. Clandon Ners excelled and was the onely Paragon. But all companion with him in the government they were like wife to feek for. As for him, no doubt they deemed him a lingular man and a brave Captain: but yet more forward and eager; thin the quality and occaons of this war required, or to be matched with such an enemy as Annibal was And therefore they thought good to joyn with him for his colleague, a fober, wife, and prudent man, who might temper and qualifie that fierce nature and disposition of his. Now M. Liviu. many years ago had been upon his Confulthip condemned by the judgement of the people. Which ignoming and reproach be took to grievonly to the heart, that he departed into the country, and for many years together, forbare not only the City, but to converte and keep company with men. And almost eight years after his condemnation aforefaid, M. Claudim Martellin, and M. Valerius Lavinse the Contuls, reduced him again into the City. But he nied to go firold and I worn apparel, letting the hair of his need and beard grow long, carrying in his very countenance and array, the fresh and notable remembrance of the diffrace before received. But L. Vetarius and P. Licinim the Centors, compelled him to cut his bair, and lay away his vile and unfeemly weed, to come into the Senat, and to meddle again in civil matters and affairs of State. And yet in to doing, he would never proceed farther, than to fay Amen to other mens opinions, and freak but one word, yes and nay; or elle nothing at all, but thew his mind by passing on his feet to one fide or other. Until fuch time as a kiniman of his own, M. Livins Macains, being in trouble, and his name and honour called in question, caused him to stand up in the Counsel-house and deliver his opinion. And when after to long discontinuance, he was seen and heard once to speak, he turned every man his eye upon him, and ministred occasion also of treech in these terms, name-v ly. "That the people had done the man exceeding great wrong, yea, and but the common west "much, in that during the time of fo dangerous a war, there had been no imployment of fo wer-"thy a person, either for his travail and pains, or his advice and counsel. But to return again to the Lords of the Senate: they knew well, that reither Q. Fabius, nor M. Valerius Lavium, could possibly be joyned as companion in government to C. Nero: for a methas it was not lawfull that both (hould be chosen out of the Nobles of Fatritii. And the same was T. Manhu his cale allo., Belides that, as he once refuled the Confuls from two hen it was effered unto him, to no doubt he would not accept thereof the second time if it were terdred omo him. But if they should fort Marcu Levin and C. Clanding together shere would be an excellent couple of Confuls in deed. Neither stood the people against this overture, thus moved first by the Lords of the ! Senat, The only man in the whole Guy, that denied it, was the very party h mielf, unto whom this dignity and honourable place was preferred. Who much blamed the levity and inconfiner of the City: laying, "That they had no pity of him; when it was a namely, whiles he was in out." Rian and accused, and during the time of his trouble waterpoor and simple garments: but now "against his will, they chice him a gliffering white robe tolliand for a Confoiship. They (quoth "he) they punish and depreis, thus they boncur and advance the same persons. If they took me "for a good and honest man, why condemned they me as they did for a wicked one and a guilty? "If they found me naught and faulty, what cause have shey to trust me with a second Confulthip, " who used the former to badly, which was commisted unto me? As he argued and made com-44 plaints in this wife, the Lords of the Senat reproved him, and replied again : fetting before his in " eyes the example of M. Farrow, who in times palt was called home out of exile: and when the "frate was dicayed and lying along, terit apright again in her former place and priffitte glory. "And like as the curlingle and rigor of parents, is to be mobified by parience, even to the bird " and threwd dealings of a mans country is to be dulced and mitigated by bearing and fufferince. So they all fluckelofe together, and chole M. Livim Conful, with C. Claudino Three dayerafter, they went to the election of the Pretors. And there were created Pretors, L. Pertina Listinia, Caim Manlins, A. Hoftibus, and C. Hoftibus, both Cares. When the election was miffied, and the games celebrated, the Dictator and General of the Cavalry furrendred their places; C. Firestins Varre was lent into Herruria as Pro-pretor, to the end that out of that province, C. Hoffilian should go to Tarentum, unto that army which T. Quintins the Cost. bad. That L. Mailiur should N go beyond Seass Embafiador, to fee how the world went there : And within confidering that in tommer, there were to be folemnized the famous games at Ohmpia, which were celebrated with a most frequent refort and meeting of all Greece, in case he might safely and without impeachment of the chemy, he should wifit that great affembly : to the end that if he could light upon as sicilians, who were fled and banished their country, or any citizens of Tarenes acconfined thinker and tent away by Annibal, they should repair home again into their own countries, and know, that what loever they were possessed of, before the wars began, the people of Rome would restore the ame, and make good again unto them. Because it was like to be a right dangero is year, and no Confuls were invested fully in the Common weal, all men depended upon the Confule elect, and were definous that they should with O all speed, cast loss for their Provinces: and every man was willing to know aforehand, what Province each one should rule, and what enemy he was to deal withal. Moreover, a motion and speech there was in the Senat-houte, that the Confuls should be reconciled and made friends and Q. Fabrus Max, propounded that fielt. For there had been notoricus enmity and variance between them aforetime; and the calamity of Living made the fame more grievous and uniopportable unto himtelf; in regard that he was periwaded, how in that milery of his, be was

A despited of his adversary. Whereupon he grew to be more implacable of the twain, and worse to be intreated. "There needs (quoth he) no reconciliation neither is it material and to any pur-"noie. For they will do all with more diligence and better spirit, who ever stand in fear that their " adverlary and concurrent thall grow great and be advanced by their default. Yet the authority of the Senat bare fuch a firoke with them, that they laid ande all malice and old grudge, and with one mind, content, and counfel, administred the affairs of the common-weal. Their Provinces were not intermingled, nor their government extended into one anothers country, as informer years, but distant asunder and divided by the remote frontiers and farthest marches of Italy. For unto one of them were affigned the Brutians and Lucans country against Annibal: unto the other, Gallia against Asarubal; who as the rumour and bruit went, was come forward neer unto the Alver. B. Of those two armies which were in Gallia and in Hetyaria, he whose fortune was to go into Gallia, was to chule which army he would, and have befides, that other of the City. And he whole lor should be to go into the Brutians country, besides the new legions enrolled of citizens, was to take unto him, the army of whether Conful he lift, of the former year. Also Quinting Fabing the Pro-conful had the charge of that army which the Conful refused and his authority was renued for one year longer. As for C. Hoftilius, whole Province Tarentum they exchanged for Hetruria, they altered his Province again, to wit, Capua instead of Tarentum. Unto him was allowed that one legion which Fulvius the last year commanded.

Now encreased their care every day more than other, concerning the coming of Asiarakal into Italy. And the Embaffadors of the Massilians had brought news first, that he was passed over into C Gallia: and that the minds of the Gauls were mightly cheered up by his coming, because the freech went, that he had brought a huge deal of gold with him, for to hire and wage fouldiers for aid in the wars. Then afterwards, Sex. Amiftius, and M. Retius, who were fent Embassadors back with them from Rame, for to fee whether it were to indeed, had made relation unto the Senate, that they had lent certain of purpose guided by the Massilians, who by means of their especiall friends, the Princes and Lords of the Gauls, might learn the truth, and bring word back accordingly. By whose report it was for certain known, that Afdrubal having levied already a puisfant army, was minded the next ipring to passe over the Alps: and that there was nothing else flaid him but that it had been done already, faving only the passages of the Alps which were clofed up with the winter inow.

In the room of M. Marcellus, L. Aquilius Patus was created Augur, and so confectated. And likewise Cn. Cornelius Dolabella was inaugurat or installed King of the sacrifices, instead of Marcus Martius, who died two years before. In this very tame year the City was purged, and there was ageneral furvey and numbring of the people, by the Centors taken, P, Sempronius Tuditanus, and Mi Cornelius Cethegus. There were reckoned and entred into the Cenjors books of Citizens, 147108. A smaller number by much ods, than before the war. It is recorded in the Annals, that this year field after that Annibal came into Italy, the Comitium was built over head and covered. And that the Roman Games were once renved by the Ædiles of the chair, Q. Metellus, and C. Servilius: and that the other Games called Plebeii, were renned two dayes by Q. Manlius, and M.Cacilium Metellun Ædiles of the Commons: who also offered three images and fet them up in If the Chappel of Ceres. And the folemn feastival dinner of Jupiter was celebrated by occasion of those Games.

Then C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the second time, entred their Consulthip: who (because whiles they, were but Goff, elect, they had calt lots for their Provinces) commanded the Pretors to do the like. And to C. Hastilius fell the jurisdiction over the citizens, who had that likewise over strangers and forrainers to the end, that the other three might go forth into their Provinces. To A. Hofilim, was allotsed Sardinia: to C. Manlius, Sicilia; and to L. Porcius France. In fum, the legions were in manber three and twenty divided into the Provinces in this fort : to wit, the Confuls had two apeece, Spain four. The three Prevots for Sicily, Sardinia, and France each of them twain, C. Terentius in Hetruria commanded two. Q. Fulvius in the Brutians country, other p two. Q. Claudius ahous Tarentum, and the Salentins conqueted twain : and Cains Hoffilius Tubulus at Capua, one. Last of all, two were entolled for the City. In the four first legions, the people chose all the Colonels or Marshals, but to all the rest the Consuls sent new to make up the

Before the Confuls went forth there was a Novembial facrifice celebrated because at Veii it had tained stones from heaven. And after one prodigious sight was once minded and spoken of, there were (as it is commonly isen) others also reported : namely, that in Minturne the temple of Jupiter, and the facred grove of * Marica was smitten with lightning and at Atella the wall and gate * The same likewife, was blafted with fire from Heaven. The men of Miniurne spake also of a more fearful that Circe. and terrible thing than that, to wit, that there ran a river of blond in their very gate. Last of all, G at Cap : aa Woif entted the gate at night, and worried and difmembred one of the watchmen.

These wondersui figns were explate with sacrificing of greater beasts, and a supplication was holden for one day, by vertue of a decree from the Prelats. Then was the Novendial factifice once again renned because it was seen, that in Armilustrum it rained stones. And mens minds were no fooner freed of one religious scruple, but they were troubled again with another, For word was brought, that at Frusino there was an infant born as big as ordinary a child is at four years of age. And the thing was not to strange for the bigness of the body, as for that it was born doubtful, whether it were male or temale, like as two years before, at Sinueffa H The wifards that were fent for out of Herrar a, faid, that this of all other was a foul and filther monster, and that it should be had forth of the Dominion of Rome, and drowned in the deep. fo as it might touch no ground. Whereupon they put it alive into a coffer, and when they had carried it a good way into the Sea, they flung it in. Moreover the Prelats made a decree, that ceri tain Virgins in three companies, having nine apiece, should go through the City, and fine certain Canticles. And whiles in the Temple of Jupiter Stator, the Maidens were a learning their fong by heart, devised and framed in verie by Living the Poet, the Temple of Queen Juno in the Aventine hill, was firiken with lightning from Heaven. And when the Aruspices had declared that this prodigious token touched the matrons and dames of the City, and that the goddels was to be pacified with an oblation; they were (by vertue of an edict granted out by the Ædiles of I the chair) called all into the Capitol, as many as had any house, either in the City of Rome, or within ten miles every way. And they among themselves choice five and twenty into whole hands all the rest should put some small portion of their dowry. Of which there was made a fair and large golden bason, for to be presented unto Juno: and it was brought into the Aventine; and withal, the dames offered unto her purely and chastly their facrifices. And streight after the Decemvirs proclaimed a day for another sacrifice of the same goddess, the manner and order whereof was this: There were two white heifers led from the I emple of Apollo into the City, through the gave Carmentalis: after them were carried two Images, representing Juno, made of Cypress wood: then went there seven and twenty Virgins in long fide garments, chanting hymns and fongs to the honour of Juno. These songs in verie were peradventure commendable, and passed w for good with those rude and gross wits then living ; but it they should be rehearled now adayes to our fine heads, they would feem but simple stuff, and composed without rime or reason, After this row of Maidens, followed the Decemvirs deputed for facred Ceremonies, with chaplets and garlands of Baies, clothed in vesture and robes embrodered with purple. From the gate abovenamed, they passed by the street Jugarius into the Grand-place, and there rested this solemn pomp and train. Then these Virgins taking hold of a cord, which went through all their hands, song a fong, and danced the measures, footing it artificially according to the note. From thence they went by the Tuscan-street and Velabrum through the beasts market, and so forward into the Clivus Publicus, until they came to the Temple of Juno. There the Decemvirs facrificed two beats, and the Images of Cypress wood were offered and set up in the Temple. When the Gods and I Goddesses were duly pacified the Consuls took musters more streightly and with greater preciseness, than any man could remember in former years. For both the fear of the war was two-fold, by reason of a new-come enemy into Italy, and also there was less store of youth, our of which the fouldiers should be enrolled. Whereupon they compelled the inhabitants of the Colonies by the Sea tide, who were faid to have an especial immunity of warfare (by a facred law) for to find fouldiers: and when they denied, and flood upon their priviledge of exemption, they let them down a certain day, upon which every man should repair into the Senate, and shew what cards they had for their immunity and vacation. Upon the day appointed there presented themfelves before the Senat their Commonalties following, to wit, of Hostia, Alsia, Antium, Anxw, Minturne Sinneffa, and Sena, from the upper Sea. When every one of these States exhibited and to read their charter of immunity, there was none of all them dispensed with, but they of Antism and Hostia, in regard the enemy abode in Italy: and so the young and serviceable men of those Colonies, were put to their oath and sware, that not above forty of them should lie one night forth of the walls of their Colony, so long as the enemy continued in Italy.

When all the LL, of the Senat were of opinion, that the Confuls were to go forth to the wars with all speed possible (for that both Afdrubal was to be encountred coming down the Alpi, for fear he should sollicit the Gauls on this side the Alps; and the Tuscans likewise who hoped and looked every day for a change and alteration; and also Annibal was to be kept occupied in his own war, that he might not go forth of the Brutians country, and meet with his brother) only Livius made some stay and drew back, as reposing but small trust in the armies belonging to his N own Provinces. And as for his Colleague, wellhe wift, that he had the choise of two norable Consular armies, and of a third, whereof Q. Claudius had the charge at Tarentum. Whereupon he had made some motion of calling the Volones [or voluntaries] again to their colours, and to kerve in the wars. The Senat granted the Confuls alarge and free commission, both to make supply from whence soever they would, by chusing out of all the armies whom they pleased, and to make exchange with whom they would, yea, and to draw out of the Provinces whomfoever, according as they should think it good for the Common-weal. And all this was executed with the exceeding concord and unity of the Confuls. The Volones were enrolled into the nineteenth and twentieth legions. Some Authors have written, that Scipio fent unto Livins from out of Spain, 2 fixing power of auxiliaries for that war, to wit, eight thousand of Spaniards and Frenchmen, two thouland legionary footmen, and eighteen bundred men of arms, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards: and that Marcus Lucretius brought these forces by Sea: also that C. Manlins sent out of Sicily four thousand archers and slingers.

The fear and troubles in Rome were much increased, by occasion of letters sent out of Gallia from L. Porcius the Pretor: purporting thus much, That Afdrubal was removed out of his wintring harbours, and was passing over the Alps: that there were eight thousand Ligurians

A levied and ready in arms, to joyn with him to foon as exerting was come into Italy, unless forme one were fent against the Ligurians, to prevent and keep them other wife busied with war. As for himfelf, he would with that weak army that he had, go forward, as far, as he thought he might with fafety. These letters caused the Consuls to dispatch the musters in great halt, and to go forth into their Provinces, footer than they had purposed: with this intent, that both of them as well the one as the other, might in his feveral province keep the enemies occupied, and fuffer them not to joyn, and lay their forces together. And verily the thing that helped them molt in this their delignment, was an opinion and periwation that Anubal had. For albeit he was aftured that his brother would that immer passover into Italy, yet when he called to remembrance what a toil he had himfelf. and how much trouble and travail he endured in the passage, one while of the river Rhodanus, and B ther while of the mountains of the Alps, and how for the space of five moneths together, he was forced not only to fight with the people, but struggle also with the difficulties of the places; he never looked that Afdrubal could so easily and so speedily pass over as he did: which was the canse that he distodged out of his wintring places so much the later. But Astrabal found better expedition, and all things more easy and speedy than either himself hoped for, or others expected. For the Arverni, and other nations (by their example) both of France and alio about the Alps, not only received and entertained him, but also accompanied him to the war. Over and belides, as he conducted his arm, by those passages which were prepared and made open by his brothers journey, and had been afortime unpaffable wilds and craggy rags: to againft his coming the Alps were much more easy, by reason of twelve years continual passage to and frothole wayes : and the na-C ture of the pealants more civil and tractable. For the people before, being not used to any strangers and aliens, nor accustomed to see passengers or travailers coming into those parts, were in manner uniociable, lavage and wild, and could not away with the lociety of men. And at the first not knowing waither Annibal intended to go, they supposed that he came for to surprise their holds in caves and rocks, to take their forreffes, and to drive away their people and cattail as booties. But afterwards, the fame that went of the Punick war (wherewith now twelve years Italy was plagued and vexed) had raught them sufficiently, that the Alps were nothing but the way for the Carthaginians to travail through. And by this time well they knew, that two molt puillant Cities and States, divided and removed one from another by a great space of Land and Sea between, strived together and warred for their greatness and Soveraignty. Upon these occasions, Itay, the Alps D were open and pattable to Afgrabal with calca, But look what time he gained by speedy journies, the same he last again byltay about Placentis, whiles he laythere in vain, rather besieging than adailing it. He was carried away with a perswafion, that the Town seated upon a plain and champain country, might foon be forced and won a and the great name that went of that noble Colony, induced him to believe, that by the overthrow and rating of that City, hethould ftrike a terror to all the reft. But in lying against that Town, he not only highled himself much, but also staid Annibal : who having heard that he was passed over the Alps, and come down into Italy, so much sooner than he looked for, was upon the point to dillodge out of his standing wintring camp, for he confidered and calt in his mind, not only what a long and tedious piece of work it is to beliege and affault Cities, but also well remembred how himself after his victory at Trebia, affaired to force that colony in his return from thence, but might not prevail. "The Confuls being departed from the City, and gone divers wayes as it were for two fundry "wars at once, diffracted mens minds with many cares and troublous imaginations, as well in "remembrance of those losses and overthrows, which they had received at Annibat his first co-"ming: as also in thinking, what gods should be so propitious and favourable to the City and " empire of Rome, as to prolper the affairs of the State and Common weal, at one time in both " places. For until then, their fuccos had been variable and alternative; and their prosperity al-"wayes delaied with (emblable advertity: and again, their loffes were recompensed with equal "gains, For when in Italy the Common wealth of Reme went one way downward headlong to " the ground at Thraffmenes and Canna ; the fortunat wars another way in Spain, let it upright a-" (gain, i) Afterwards, when in Spain one overthrow and defeat hapned in the neck of another, ce at what time as two noble Captains were flain, and two valuant atmies in gart deftroyed, the "happy and lucky hand in Sielly and Italy, made up thole becaches, and fee the reeling it ale on " foot again. For why a the very differee of the place to far remote (because one of the wars " was maintained in the lambelt part of the World) yerden time and telpite to breath the michves and gather new ftrength. The fresh and lameorable fament-G a brance allo of the very last year, wherein two Confuls, lost their lives, mighrily strighted the "hearts of the people. So as, in their perplanities and troubles of minds, they accompanied the Contels as they departed and went into their feveral Provinces. Je is more over in fome records found, that when Q. Fabius advited and warned M. Livinus being upon his, journey to ward the wars, not rathly and hand over head to give battail to the enemy, before he knew his nature and qualicies, he full of anger ftill and discontentments with his tellow cryzens, made this an-

Before that Clandine the Confol was come into his Province, C. Hofiline Tubulus accompanied with certain coborts lightly appointed, encountred Annibal as he led his army and marched by the atter confines and marches of the territory of Larinnum, which leadeth to the Salentins; and charging upon his diordred army, put them to great trouble, flew four thoutand of his men, and carried away nine Enfigns. Q. Clandine who had certain garrifons planted in all the Cities of the Salentins country, hearing of the enemies coming, had removed out of his winting camping and therefore Annibal, because he would not fight with two armies at once, by night dilodged I out of the territory of Tarentum, and withdrew himself into the Brutians country: and Clandine turned with his army to the Salentins again. Hofiline in the way to Capna, met with the Confol Clandine at Vienes, a. There, out of both armies, the Conful picked forth forty thousand choise Feotmen, and 2500 Horsemes, for to war with Annibal. The rest of the forces Hofitime was commanded to lead unto Capna, and to deliver them to Q. Fabrus the Pro-conful.

Annibal having affembled his forces from all parts, as well those which he had in campduring winter time, as those that lay in garrison in the Brutians country, came as far as Grumentum in the territory of the Lucans, upon hope to recover the Towns, which for fear, hadrevolted to the Romans. Unto the same place the Roman Cost. making out his cipials before to discover and eleer the wayes, marched from Venufia, and about a mile and half from the enemy, K encamped himtelf. The Carthaginians had fortified themselves, and cast a trench close in a manner to the walls of Gramentum: and between the camp and the Romans was fomehalf mile. A plain lay in the midft : and on the left hand of the Carthaginians, and the right hand of the Romans all along between, the hills overlooked them, bare and naked, and of neither part suspected, by reason that they had no wood growing upon them, nor any lurking places to hide an ambush in. Into the plain between they used to put out certain bands and companies from the Corps de guard of both fides, and made light skirmishes not worth thetalking of. And it feemed that the disit of the Roman Conful was to keep the enemy in, and not to fuffer him to go his wayes. But Annibal desirous to be gone, entred the field with all his power in order of battail. Then the Conful borrowing a little of his enemies cuming, for that in to open hills there I. was lefs fear and suspicion of ambulhts gave order that five Coborts and Horsemen, reenforced with as many bands of footmen, should by night ger over those hills, and in the Vallies behind, fit down closely: with direction to T. Cland m Afeline a Colonel of footmen, and P. Clandins a Captain of allies whom he fent to conduct them; at a certain time to arise out of ambush, and to charge the enemy a himself by day light led forth all his whole power as well foot as Horseinto the field. Within a while after, Annibal likewise put forth the fignal of battail : and all the camp over they ict up a cry, running all about to their armour and weapons. Then Footmen and Horsemen both rushed space out of the gates who could be soonest forth; and scattered as they were all over the plain, made haft to the enemies. Whom when the Conful faw thus difordered, he commanded C. Aurunculesse a Tribun or Colonel of the third legion, to put out the Ca- M valry belonging to that legion, for to charge the enemy with all the violence he could : for that like theep they were to spred over the plain without all form and fathion, and might be surprised, discomfied, and beaten down, before they could be brought into array and fet in order of battail. Annibal himfelf was not come forth of the camp, when he might hear the noise of them fighting together and hard at it : and excited with this tumult, he led in great baft all the reft of his forces against the enemy. By this, the vanguard and forefront of his battail was frighted with the Horfemen of the enemies: yes, and the first legion of the Infantry and the Cavalry of the right wing began to charge. The Carthaginians disordered as they were, fought at a venture, as they chanced to meet either with Footmen or Horsemen. The conflict grew hotter, by reason of new supplies and fresh succours, and encreased still by the number of them that N continually ran out to the fight. And furely Annibal, notwithstanding this tumult and troublefome fear, had fer and marshalled his men in good order as they were fighting (which had been no casy thing to do, but that the army was of old souldiers, and their Captain well experienced and beaten to it) if it had not been for the shout of the cohorts and bands above-laid, which they heard at their backs, as they from the hills behind ran down upon them; and fet them in great fear, lest that they would thrust in between them and home, and so shut them out of their camp. Hereupon I fay they were affrighted, and began to flie here and there, But the flaughter was the leis, because the camp was neer, and far they had not to run thither and save themtelves in this their fea ful fright, For the Horlemen plaid upon their backs ftill, and gave not over : the collects from the open Mountains ran eafily down the hill, and charged croffe o upon their fides and flanks. Howbeit, there were flain more than eight thousand men, and above co taken Prifoners: nine Enfigns won and carried away: of Elephants alfo (whereof there was little or no nie) in a fuddain and tumultuary skirmish four were killed, and two gotten alive. Of Romans and Allies, there died two bundred. The next day after, Annibal flirred not. The Roman Conful having brought his army forth into the field, and teeing none to come abto d and make head against him, commanded the flain enemies to be difarmed and despoiled,

A the spoils to be gathered up, and the bodies of his own men to be brought together into a place and buried. For certain dayes after continually, he prefled so hard at the camp gates, that he wanted but little of entring thither with banner displayed. In so much as Annibal at the third watch of the night, leaving behind him many fires burning, and divers tents standing, on that fide especially which looked toward the enemies, and some few Numidians, to make a shew upon the Rampier and at the gates; dislodged, and purposed to go into Apulia, The next morning by day light, the Roman army embattailed, approached the trench and rampier. The Numidians of fet purpose shewed themselves in the gates and upon the rampier: and when they had a good while dallied thus and played with the enemy, they mounted on Horieback, and soared no Horse-flesh until they had overtook their fellows. The Consul perceiving that B all was quiet within the camp, and feeing not fo much as those few appear any where, who in the morning betimes had walked their flations, fent forth two Horlemen into the camp as efpials. After he understood for certain that all was fafe, and the coasts clear, he commanded his entions to make an entry. And staying no longer there, than whiles his fouldiers ran up and down to pill and spoil, he sounded the retreat: and long before night, brought his army back again. The next morrow after, he fet forward by the dawning of the day, and with long jonrneis, following his enemies by the voyce of the country, and tracing them by their footieps, he overtook them not far from Venusia. There also was a scuffing skirmith between them, and not so lew as two thousand Carthaginians slain. From thence Annibal ever marched by night, and journied through the mountains, because he would give his enemy no vantage of fight, un-C till he came to Metapontum. From whence Hanno (for he was Captain of the garrison there) was sent with some few in his train into the Brutians country, to levy a new army. And Annibalaster he had joyned those forces to his own, returned again to Venusia, by the same way that he came from thence; and fo forward he marched to Canufium. Nero never left the enemy, but was ready to tread on his heels, and as he marched himself toward Metaponium, he had sent for Q. Fulvius to repair into the Lucans country, because those parts should not be dissurpished of In this mean space, there were four French Horsemen, and two Numidians, sent to Annibal with letters from Afdrubal, after he was removed from the fiege of Placentia: who having travailed in manner all the length of Italy, through the mids of the enemies, whiles they follow af-Diter Annibal in his retire unto Metapontum, miffed of their way, and light upon Tarentum: where they were encountred by the forragers of the Romans that ranged about the fields, and by them were brought before Q. Claud w the Propretor. At the first they entertained him with flim flams, with doubtful and intricate answers: but when the fear of the rack and other tortures, had forced them to tell a truth, they confessed, that they had letters about them to deliver from Afdrubal to Annibal. With those letters sealed as they were they were committed unto L. Virginius a Colonel, for to be conveied unto Claudius the Conful. And two troops or Cornets befides of Samnit Horsemen were sent to guard them. So toon as they were come unto the Conful, and the letters read by an interpreter, and some examination taken of these captives: then Classdius confidering that the common-weal was not now in that good case, nor the occasion such, E that each Governor needed no more, but to make war by the ordinary course of commission. within the compass and limits of his own Province, with the help of his own army alone, and against an enemy assigned unto him by the Senate: but that some unlooked for adventures must be enterprised, some new designments and unexpected put in execution, which when they are begun and attempted, might make no less wonder and fear among their own friends, that terror among the enemies: and being once performed and done, might turn the former fear into as great joy and gladnes; sent the letters of Asarubal to the Senat at Rome: and withal, himself acquainted the Lords of the Senate what he intended to do. And for almuch as Afdrabal wrote unto his brother to meet him in Umbria, he advised them to fend for the legion at Capua to Rome, to take musters also at Rome, and to oppose that army of the City, against the enemy at Narnia. F Those were the contents of his letters to the Senate. He dispatched likewise messengers before, through the territories of the Larinats, Marucins, Ferentins, and Pretutians (by whom he means to lead his army) for to give notice, that all the inhabitants of those parts, should out of their Villages and good Towns, provide and bring torth victuals into the high wayes, for to refresh his fouldiers; allo to come with their Care-hories, draught oxen, and other beasts for carriage, together with wains and cares, that the wegaried souldiers might ease themselves thereby. Himself out of his whole army, as well of citizens as alles, those forth the sour and most picked men of all, to the number of sixthousand soots, and one thousand horse, and gave it out openly, that he minded to surprise the first City that he same next unto in the Lucans country, and withal, the gartion of Carthaginians, that lay there; and therefore commanded them to be ready for the journey and expedition. Thus when he had set forward in the night, he turned his way into Piernam. And the Consult made no more ado, but with long journies highed him as fast as he

Pleasure. And the Conful made no more ado, but with long journies highed him as fast as he could, and led his army directly to his colleague, leaving Q. T. arm his Lieutenaut, to guard and command the camp.

At Rome, they were no leffe terrified and troubled, than they were two years before, at what time as the Carthaginians were encamped before the walls and gates of the City. And men wift not well, what to make of this adventurous and audacious journey of the Conful, whether they should praise or dispraise it. And it seemed that they would measure it and report thereof accor. H ding to the event, than which farely, there is nothing more unjust and unequal. But thus they whifpered, "That the camp was left with an army, and without their General, neer unto the "enemy Annibal, yea, and the same guelded of all the strength and flour thereof : that the Contol oretended an expedition into the Lucans country, when indeed he went toward Picenum and " Gallia : leaving the camp by no one thing more late and fecure, than by the errour and miltaking of the enemy, who is altogether ignorant, that the General is gone from thence, and part of the "forces with him. But where would they be then, and in what taking hould the camp be in cale "that were known abroad; or it Annibal would either with his whole army follow after Nero. "being gone with no more than fix thousand? or affault the camp, left as it were for a prey unto " him, without forces, without conduct, and without the fortune and good luck of the General to t " protect it? The old defeats received in this war, the fresh remembrance of two Consuls slain s but the last year, encreased mens tear. All which misfortunes happed, when there was in Itale "but one Captain General, and one fingle army of the enemies. Now, of one war of the Car-" thaginians there are made twain; and two Annibals (as a man would fay) be both at once in 4 Italy, right valorous and renowned warriors. For even Afdrubal alfo, was Amilear his fon as "well as Annibal, as valiant and redoubted a Captain every way : as who for io many vests toa gether in Spain, hath been exercised in the Roman wars, and born the name of atchieving a "twofold victory, and defeating two armies, with two molt noble and famous commanders: and " as for expedition and speed in his voyage out of Spain, and for raising the Nations of France up " in arms, he may make his boalt much more truly than Annibal himfelt. For even in thole very K " places, where Annibal had loft the greater part of his fouldiers, with hunger and cold, (which "kind of death of all others is most miterable) this Afdrubal hath levied a power of armed men "Moreover, they that knew Spain well, and the affairs which had passed there, faid besides, That "he had not to deal with Nero, as with a warrior whom he knew not already; for why? he had when it was, made a Child of Nero, by a good token, That when Afdrabal was by chance in a " wood, and could not get out, was put to his shifts; but whiles he triffed out the time with Nero "in booking deceitful conditions and capitulations of peace, he shewed him a confening Cartha-"gipian calt, gave him the fair flip, and escaped out of his hands. And to conclude, in all their "discourses at Rome, they magnified every thing on the enemies part above all truth, and debated " all their own means of help beneath all reason : such was their fear, which interpreteth and con-6 ftruet hall to the world.

The speech of Nero to his fouldiers,

Nere, when he had now gained to much ground, and was gone to far from the enemy, as it had not mattered much if his detigns had been revealed and made known unto him for any danger that might entue thereof; called his touldiers before him; and spake some few words to this or the like effect. "Never was there delignment (qd. he) of any General in the field, in outward they more es dangerous, in deed and truth more lafe and fecure, than this of mine. I lead you to a certain and " affured victory, even to that war, unto which my colleague would not go before the Senate had "allowed him to his full contentment, a greater power both of foot and Horle, and the fame better et let out and more turnified, than if he thould have gone against Annibal himself : and therefore " whatfoever imall poife and addition of forces you bying thereto, you shall sway thereby the M "whole, and as it were weigh down the ballance. Fer when the enemies ready embattailed to "fight, shall bear (and before that time, I will take order I grow, that they shall not hear) that ano-"ther Conful and another army is come, no doubt the day will be ours, and they shall yeeld us the et victory. For it is a fame & name only, that fightern the field & determineth battails. And imall er matters many times carry away the game, and cause mens minds both to stoop for fear, and to "rife with hope. And verily, of a well fought field you are they that shall reap the fruit & gain the eglory. For alwayes it is feen, that a little help that cometh laft, is more than all befides, & feemeth " to effect the whole. And you tee your felves, with what concourfe, with what admiration, with ec what affectionat favour all men do entertain & regard you by the way. And in very truth, as they murched along in their journey, it was a world to fee, how both men & women flocked out of all N the villages of the countrey to fee them, how they forted themselves into companies & degrees to welcome them, and how as they palled as it were in a lane through them, they made vows in their name, they poured out their prayers in their behalf, & dealt prairies among them : calling them the very guard & defence of the Common weal, the faviours & redeemers of Rome & the Roman Empire acknowledging that the lives and liberties of themselves and their children, lay in their right hands; and depended upon the force of their arms: praying to all the gods and goddenes; and to all the holy halows of heaven, to vouch are them a lucky journey, a fortunal fight, and a speedy victory over their enemies: withing heartily, that they might be bound and condemned (as it were) to pay and perform their vows, which in their name they had undertaken & promifed defitting earneltly, that as flow they went along, & accompanied them with careful minds for fear of the petil which M they went unto, to after few dayes they might meet with them upon the way with joyful hearts, as they return with Triumph for their victory. Every man for himself in particular invited them friendly, offered them frankly, entreated and belonght them importunatly, that all things whatfoever they flood in need of, either for themselves or their bealts, they would receive at his hands especially, as being ready to afford them all most liberally, heapful, and with the better. The fouldiers again, for very modelty frove to take no more than was very needful and necessary.

A no flay they would make with any, nor one jot depart from their colours. Their meat they took by the way as they went, journeying night and day, and fearce allowing their bodies rest and sleep to content their weak nature that looked for it. Now had Nero fent afore-hand to his brother Consul certain Courriers, to give him advertisement of his coming, and to know again from him his mind, whether he should come openly or secretly, by day time or by night, and lodge in one camp with him, or in another apart by himself. Livius his advice was, and he thought it the better of the twain, to enter into his camp, closely in the night season, and had given a watch-word, and made it known throughout all the camp, that every Marshal and Colonel should lodge a Marshal or Colonel, every Centurion entertain a Centurion, every knight or man of arms receive a knight or horseman, and every footman rake unto his. a footman into his pavilion and cabbin. R For it was not expedient that the camp should be enlarged and set out wider, for sear that the enemy might take knowledge of another Confuls coming: and so much the more easily might many of them be bestowed in the streight room of their pavilions, because the army of Claudius had brought in manner nothing with them in this expedition, lave their armour only. Moreover, in the very way as they came, the company was well mended and much encreased; by many voluntaries that offered themselves willingly of their own accord, as well old fouldiers, fuch as had served out their years, as young and lufty men: whom Claudius perceiving so to strive for to have their names entred if he faw them perionable and firong of body and like to do good fervice, had enrolled into the muster book. The other Conful lay encamped before * Sena, and * Senagagitation Aldrubal some half mile from him. And therefore Nero, being now approached and come neer, fat him down close among the mountains, because he would not put himself within camp before night. And when they were come thither, they were welcomed every man according to his degree, by them of their own place and calling, and brought into their tents and pavilions, and with regeneral joy of all friendly entertained as their loving guests. The next day following they assembled together to counsel: at which meeting, L. Porcius Licinius the Pretor was present: who was himself encamped close unto the Consuls leaguer. He before their coming, by leading his army over the high places, and one while keeping the narrow flreights of the forrest to impeach and flop the passages, another while charging upon the slanks and sides, or else upon the back and tail of the enemy, had by all the devices and policies of war, mocked him and kept him play, This man, I say, was at the foresaid counsel. Many men there were of opinion, that the day of D battel should be deferred for a time, whiles Nero might have some few dayes respite, both to refresh his fouldiers, wearied with long travail and much watching, and also to know the quality somewhat better of his enemy. Nere not only persisted still to perswade, but also began most earnefly to intreat, "That they would not by long delay make that defign of his to feem rath "and dangerous, which speediness in execution had made safe and secure. Considering, that whiles A mibal, upon ignorance and error (which is not like to continue long with him) "lay fill afleep and benummed, neither once thought upon it, to affail the camp left without a "General, nor put nimiell upon the way, to make pursure after me; now before he once stir, "Imay (quoth he) deseat the army of Afarubal, and return again into Apulia. But he that "by deferring fill, giveth the enemy time and respite, betraieth asmuch as lieth in him, the E" campunto Annibal, and laieth the way open for him into Gallia, to joyn with Asdrubal at his " good leafure and pleafure. Nay (quoth he) the figual of battel must be given forthwith, and "we must into the field. We must, I say, take the vantage, and make the best of the error and ig-"norance of our enemies, both absent there, and present here: that neither they with Annil al " may know that they are to deal with fewer; not these again beware, that they are to fight with " more in number, and stronger in power. Thus the counsel brake up, and the signal of battel was put forth, and prelently they went into the field. The enemies were already advanced in battel array, and flood with displayed enligns. The only flay of joyning in fight was this, That Afdruhal tiding out with some few Horsemen before the entigus, chanced to mark some old targets of his enemies which he had not as yet feen, and their Horfes more lank and lean, than early bep fore. And (as beguessed) the number also was greater than ordinary and usual. Suspecting therefore, that which was indeed, he founded the retreet in all halt; and fent out prefently to the river where they used to water to see if they might either light upon some secarch them prisoners, or at least-wife take good marks by their eye, whether any of them haply were higher coloured, or looked simburnt, presently upon their late travel. Also he gave them commandment to ride aloof about their camp, and to spie whether the rampier were enlarged or set out farther in any place, and to liften attentively whether the trumpet founded fingle or double within the camp, When all other circumstances besides were related in order affirmatively, only the not enlarging of the camp, put them by their hint, and gave the occasion that they were beguiled. Two severall camps they were, like as before the coming of the Conful: the one belonging to M. Livius, the other to L. Porcius. And in neither of them were the rampiers and trenches let out any jor, whereby they might put up more tents, and quarter themselves in larger room, But this one thing troubled this old experienced Captain, and acquainted to well as he was with the Roman enemies that his espials brought word how in the Pretors camp they sounded the trumpet once, and in the Confols twice. For furely that was an evident argument that two Confols were there. And in thinking how the other Conful had departed from Annibal Segiven him the flip, he mightily tomiented himself. And he could not suspect & imagine that, which was indeed the truth, namely, that Annibel was deluded and mocked in a matter of lo great moment, as to be ignorane what the was become of the General, or of the army, to which he lay fo close and neer entamped. Surely (thought he) and without all question, he hath received no imall foil and overthrow, and in this fright dareth not make after and follow the enemy. Nay, he feared much, left all were loft and gone, and that he should not come time enough to help and succour him and that the Romans had gotten already the same good hand in Italy, which they had before in Spain. Otherwhiles. he was perswaded, that his letters never came to Annibal his hands, that they were intercepted. and so the Consul made hast to prevent him, and give him the foll by the way! Being perplexed with these careful cogitations, he caused the fires to be put out, and at the figual given at the first watch, to trul's up bag and baggage, and to dislodge, and be gone. In this fearful hast, and nightly tumult, the guides whiles they were flenderly looked unto, and small need was taken of them. To one of them fat down and refted close in a fecret lurking hole which he had before deflined in his mind ; the other waded over the river Metaurus, through the foords that he was well acquainted with, and lo got away and made an escape. So the army left at random without their guides, first wandred over the fields, and then diverse of them being weary and fleepy with overwatching. laid them down along here and there, and left their colours with few about them. Alarabat commanded them to march along the bank of the River, and to follow it, until the day-light might direct them the right way: and fo going a compass in and our according to the winding reaches and cranks of the River, wandred a great while, and gained but a small ground forward. Now when day light once appeared, he purpoted to spie out the first place for convenient passage and there to get over. But finding no foords, by reason that the farther it was from the Sea, the K higher were the banks from the water that kept in the River, he spent all the live-long day, and gave the enemy time to follow after him. And first Clandius Nero came with all the Horiemen, then Porcius followed hard after with the van-courriers, and light aimed footmen. Whilesther made offer to charge their enemies in their march, every way, and plaid ftill upon them, info much as now Afdrubal leaving to journey forward (wherein he leemed rather to fleethan march) was desirous to take alittle hillalong the river side, and there to encamp and fortisse: Livius was come also with all the main power of footmen, so armed and so orderly appointed and marshalled, as they were not only provided to march in journey, but ready also presently to give battail. But when they were all joyned together, and aranged in battail array; Claudian had the leading of the right wing, Livius commanded the left, Wand the Pretor took the charge and IC conduct of the main battail. Afdrubal feeing no orfier remedy but to fight, never fortified his camp; but in the fore-front before the vanguard, and in the very mids, placed his Elephants: about them in the left wing he opposeth the French again the laudius; not so much trusting upon them, as supposing verily that the enemy was afraid of them: and in proper person he took up the right wing against Livius for himself and the Spaniards, in whom being old beaten souldiers) he reposed his most hope. The Lightians in the midd were bestowed behind the Elephants. But the battail was rather drawn out in length, than stretched forth in breadth. The Frenchmen were defended with the hill that bare out over them. That front which the Spaniards kept; encountred with the left wing of the Romans. And all the battail of the right fide, which bate out from the conflict, flood fill and fought not. The fill that was opposite against them, was the M cause that neither afront, nor aflank, they could charge upon the enemy. But between Living and Aldrabal there was an hot fight begun already, and cruel bloudfied on both fides. There were both the General Captains: there was the greater part of the Romans, as well foot as Horse: there were the Spaniards, old and experienced fouldiers, skilfull also in the Roman manner of fight: there were the Ligurians, a tough nation, and hardy in fights. Against this barrailon were the Elephants turned, who at the first shock and onset troubled and disordered the vanguard, yea, and began to force the enfigns to give ground. But after upon the noise that grew greater, and the battail that waxed hotter, they began to be uffruly, and travers between both Battails, as it were doubtful to whether fide they belonged," much like to frips left hulling and floring without their pilots and fleers men. Then Clandins cried out eftfoons to his fouldiers: To what N end quoth he, made we such post hast, and took to long a journey? But seeing that he laboured in vain to advance his banners and mount up against the hill opposite unto him, and perceiving that way how it was impossible to come unto the enemy and to enter upon him, he drew forth cettain cohorts' out of the right wing where he faw they were liker to frand fill thanto nebt; and wheeled about behind the enemies battail, and so unwates not only to the enemies, but allow his own men, he charged upon the left flank of the enemies : and he bestirred himself to himbly, that when he had shewed himself on the sides, presently he plaid upon their backs; in stich fort, that now on all hands, affront, behind, and on their flanks, down went the Spaniards and Ligurians, and were hewn in pieces, yea, and the execution reached to the very French. There, with them was least ado; and smallest fight of all: for a great many of their fellows had abandoned their co- o lours and being flipt away in the night, lay affeed all over the fields: and such as were there, wear with travail and watching (as having bodies that of all things cannot away with labour and pains taking) were fearce able to bear their corfelets on their backs, Beildes, now it was high noon; and what with drought & heat together they flood gaping for air & yeelded their bodies either tobe massacred, or taken captive. As for the Elephants, there were more of them killed by the hands of the governors and guiders that fate upon them; than by the enemy that lought against them. For so their manner was to have about them a Carpenters chiffel and a mailet, and when the beats began once to rage and to run upon their own fellows, their malters would fet the faid chilfel between their cars, even in the very joynt where the nape of the neck and the head meet together. and with his mallet to drive it as hard as he could : this was found to be the readieft and most freedy way to kill fo mighty and huge a healt, when they were past all hope to rule them and keep shem in order. And the fire inventor and practifer of this feat was Afdrubal, a famous and memorable Captain, as in many other respects, so especially for this battail. He it was that held one to the end, exhorting his folldiers to fight, fighting allo him felf, and adventuring all dangers : he it was, that when his men were weary and drew back (by reason of long toil and abour) incenfed them again, one while by fair words and intreaty, another while by sharp checks and re-B bakes : he reclaimed them again when they were running away ; he renewed the fight in divers places when it flaked and gave over. And at the very laft, when he faw evidently that the onemy had the honor of the day, because he would not remain alive after so great an army deseated that followed his frandard, and were induced by the reputation and name that went of him, he fer spurs to his Horse, and rode among the Squadrons of the Roman Horse nen; and there, as befeemed Amilears fon, and Annibals brother, fighting right manfully, was flain. Never duting the time of this war in one field were there fo many enemies killed: and it feemed now that for loffe of Captain and overthrow of army, they might well cry quittance with them for the defeat at Canna. Slain there were 56000 enemies, 6400 taken priloners, and a rich booty and pillage gained of all forts, befides gold and filver. Moreover, there were recovered of Roman Ceitizens above four thomand, who had been taken prisoners, and were among the enemies. That comfort they had to make amends for the fouldiers that died in this battail ; for they won not the victory without bloudshed in this field, wherein to the number slanost of eight thousand Romans and allies together, loft their lives. And the Conquerors themselves had so much their fill of bloud and flaughter, that the next morrow, when word was brought unto Living the Conful, that divers Citalpine Gauls, and Ligurians, which either were not at the battail, or escaped out of the execution, and were going away in one company all together, without a certain Leader, without Eafigns, without any order or command, and might all be put to the (word and utterly destroyed, if there were but one cornet of Horsemen sent out after them, " Nay, quoth he, let some remain alive to tell the news both of our enemies loffe and ruin, and of "our own vertue and valour. And Nero the very next night after the battail, marched with more speed backward, than he came thither, and within fix dayes returned again fo far as to his standing leaguer, and the enemies. All the way as he marched, he was not indeed so resorted unto and frequented by to many men, by reason that there went no harbingers or messengers before : but his coming was welcomed, with fo great gladness and mirth, that for very joy, the people were welneer besides themselves. As for Rome, it cannot be uttered and expressed in words sufficiently, how men were affected the one way or the other : neither how pensive the City was in doubtful expectation of the event, nor how joyous and jocund again, upon the news and tidings of the victory. For never one day (after the rumour once was blown thither, that Clandin; the Conful was gone forth in his expedition) from the fun-rifing unto the fetting, de-E parted either Senators out of the Councel-chamber, from attendance upon the Magistrats, or the people out of the Common hall. The dames of the City, because other help they could yeeld none, betook themselves to their beads and devotions, and in every Church went up and down, and plied all the Gods with prayers, with vows, and humble supplications. As the City was thus perplexed and in suspence; first there came tome slying news, that two Horsemen of Naraia were come out of the battail, and returned to the camp which lay to guard and keep the streights and passages of &mbria, who had brought word thither, that the enemies were defeated. At the fift, they rather em their ears to hear thefe tidings, than bent their minds to entertain the fames as being greater than they might in heare conceive, and more joyful than they could affured y believe : and the exceeding swiftnes of the rumor hindred the credit thereof, because it was p reported, withat, that the battel was fought but two dayes before. Then were letters brought from Ir. Manline Acidemas, fent one of the camp; which confirmed the arrival of those Horismen of Name. Ebofe letters were brought through the common place, unto the Tribunal of the Pretor . whereupon the Lords of the Senat were fede for our of the Councel-house. But the people kept fuch a thrulling and thronging about the door of the Sense, that the meffenger could not palle thither, but was baled and pulled by the people, queltioning with him, and calling hard upon him, that the letters (hould be read at the market crofs; and in the Roftra, before they were opened in the Senate. But at the last, they were restrained by the Magistrars and caused to void, and actuly could the joy be contained among tomrally people, who had no measure not rule of their affections. Well, the letters were first read in the Senst, and then in the affembly of the people : G and there, according to the divers dispositions of men, some took joy and contentment of mind, as upon a certainty : others would give no credit, before they either heard the meffengers speak direcht, from the Confuls, or faw their letters. After this, word came, that there were Embassadors themselves at hand. And then indeed, there ran to meet them, of all forts, young and old, every one defreed to be the first, to see and to bear these to glad tidings. And they went out to far as the hidge Miknin; and all the way along, was full of people. These Embessadors or messengers, ward A. Veraria: Phile, P. Lecrone: Varus, Q. Cevilini Merellar. of all degrees and qualities, that flocked about them, same as far as to the ec mm on place a female quellioned withthemicives, others enquired of their train and retinue, what new sand towish World went. Andas any one had caught an end from them, that the atmy and Captain General of the enemies was flain, or the Roman legions fale, and the Confuls sive and well he would immediatly impart his joy unto others. Much ado had they to con einto the Carin, and more allo there was, to keep on the multiple, that they were not mingled among the Lord at the feature. But at fall the letters were read in the Sense. From thence were the Embaladors hought much general affembly of the people. And L. Volucius after he had read the letters explained himfelf from point to point in order, how every thing was done, with great appliants a management with a general show of all the assembly, who hadly could conceive in their minds logical joy. Then they ran divers wayes, tome to the Temples, of the Gods to tender thanks, others to their own houtes, to communicate with their wives and children to lucky and fortunate sidings. And the Senat decreed a folemn procession for three dayes together, forasmuch as M. Lannuand C. Claritim the Confile, with the largey of the legions had vanquilbed the enemies, hilled their Goneral, and put their army to the fword. This procession C. Hafriliu the Preton, published in the open affembly of the people : and it was celebrated and folempized both by men and women All the Temples for three dayes fully, were likewife replenished with the one lexiand the other. For the Matrons and Dames of the City, in their belt apparrel, together with their children, yellded praife and thanks to the immortal Gods, as if now they had been freed from all fear, and the war come to a final end for ever. This victory altered the very flate and course of the commonweal, fo as from that time forward, as in time of fetled peace, men doubt make contracts, buy and fell, borrow and lend, yea, and pay debts to their creditors.

C. Claudius the Conful, to foon as he was entred into the camp again, caused the head of Afdrubal (which he had preferred with great care and brought with him) to be thrown out before the Corps de guard and stations of the enemies, and that the Affrican captives, should be shewed bound as they were in chains: and two of them to be lent loofe unto Annibal, to declare and recount in order, how every thing apped. Antibal having at once received this double blow, mourning as well for the publick loffe of the flare, as for the calamity, hapned in his own houl. fetched a deep figh (by report) and laid : At, I fee well the hard tortune of Carriage, And diflodging from thence because he would bring together all his forces (which being dispersed alunder, he was not able to hold and maintain) into the utmost angle of Italy, (the Brutians country) p. he brought thither as well the Metapontins, even the whole state of them, who abandoned their own Towns and Cities, as also the Lucans, as many as were subject unto him, and under his obe-्रा । राज्यास कोवर्त । उने विवाहका एवं एक स्थायता को है । ले साहरणी ह

Hen it feemed that Spain was eafed as much of war, as Italy charged therewith, by the voyage of Afarabal thither: behold, all of a sudden there arose other troubles there equall to the former. And as for the Provinces of Spain at that time they were possessed between Romans & Carthaginians in this manner, Aldrubal the fon of Gifgo, was retired with his powerfar within the country, even to the Ocean and G. des. But the coalis bordering upon our lea, and in manner all Spain bending toward the East, was held by Scipio, and subject to the Roman Empire. Hanno the new General, being passed out of Affrick with a fresh army, and entred into the room of Asarabal the Barchine, joyned with Mago: and when he had put in arms within a short time, a great number of men in Celsiberia, which lieth in the midst between the two seas; Scipia sent forth against him; M. Syllanus made ten thousand foot, and five hundred hoffemen. This Syllanus made fuch speed by taking as long journies as posfibly he could (confidering how much hindred and troubled he was, both by the roughness of the waies, and also by the straights, environed with thick woods, and forrests, as most parts of Spain are) that notwithstanding all those difficulties, he prevented not only the messengers, but also n the very fame and rumour of his coming, and by the guidance of certain fugitive revolts out of Celtiberia, he passed forward from thence to the enemy. By the same guides he had intelligence, and was for certain advertised (being now some ten miles from the enemy) that about the very way where he should march there were two camps; namely, on the left hand the new army abovefaid of Celtiberians, to the number of more than nine thouland lay encamped, and the Carthaginians on the right. As for this Leaguer it was well defended and fortified with corps de guardis which watch and ward both night and day, according to the good order and discipline of war. But the other was as much neglected, dissolute, loose, and out of order, like as commonly barbarous people and raw fouldiers are, and fuch as fear the less, by reason they are at home within their own country, S) Hanus thinking it good policy to fet upon them fift, gave commandment to E march under their enfigns and colours, and bear toward their left hand as much as they could for fear of being discovered in some place or other by the guards and Sentinels of the Carthaginians, And himself in person, having sent before certain vant-courriers and espials, with his army advanced apace directly toward his enemy. Now was he approached within three miles of them unespied, and not descried at all. For why ? a mountain country it was, full of roughs and crage, overfipread and covered with woods and thickets. There in a hollow valley between, and therefore secret for the purpose, he commanded his souldiers to sit them down and take their resection. In this mean time the espials came back and verified the words of the fugitives aforesaid Then the Romans, after they had piled their packs, their truffes and baggage in the midft, armed themselves, and in order of battell set forward to fight. When they were come within a mile of p the enemies, they were discovered by them, who began suddenly to be affraid. Mago at the first outcry and alarm, let spurs to his horse, and rode a gallop out of his Campto succour. Now, there were in the army of the Celtiberians, four thousand footmen targettiers, and two hundred horse. This Troopbeing in manner the flower and very strength of the whole army, and as it were a full and compleat legion heplaced in the varguard; all the rest, which were lightly armed, he bestowed in the rereward for to succour and rescue. As he led them forth thus ordered and arranged they were not well issued without the trench, but the Romans began to lance their javelins and darts against them. The Spaniards to avoid this volley of shot from the enemies, couched close under their shields, and defended themselves, and afterwards they rose up at once to charge again upon them. But the Romans standing thick, as their manner is, received all their darts in & their targets, and then they closed man to man, and foot to foot, and began to fight at hand with their (words. Howbelt, the suggedness of the ground, as it nothing availed the swiftness of the Celtiberians (whole guile is to run to and fro in skirmish and keep no ground) so the same was not hurtfull at all to the Romans, who were used to a set battell, and to stand to their fight : only the Atright room, and the trees and thrubs growing between parted their ranks and files afunder, fo a s they were forced to maintain kirmith either fingly one to one, or two to two at the most, as if the y had been matched to cope together even. And look what thing hindered the enemies in their flight, the same yielded them, as it were, bound hand and foot unto the Romans, for to be H killed. Now when all their targettiers wel-near of the Celtiberians were flain; their light armed fouldiers, and the Carthaginians also, who from the other camp ran to succour, were likewise difarraied, discomfited and hewn in pieces. So there were two thousand footmen, and not above. and all the horsemen (who scarce began battell) fled with Maga and escaped. As for Hannothe other Generall, together with them who came last, and to the very end of the fray, was taken alive. But Magofled ftill: and all the Cavalry, with as many as remained of the old footmen followed after, and by the tenth day arrived in the Province of Gades, and came unto Aldrubal. The Celtiberians, that were but new fouldiers, flipt into the next woods out of the way, and fo from thence fled home. This fortunate victory hapned in so good a time, not so much slifted the present war in the ve.

siberians already. Whereupon, Scipio having highly commended Syllanus, and conceived great hope withall to dispatch quite, and make an end of the wars, in case himself lingred not the matter, and made long (tay; purined the remnant behind, and fet forward into the usmost Province of Sp in against Asarubal. But Asarubal, who hapned then to lye encamped in * Baticator to keep his Allies in obedience and faithfull alleageance, all on a judden diflodged, pluckt up tiandards, and away; and more like one that fled than marched, led his army farther into the country, even as far as the Ocean, and to Gades. But supposing that so long as he kept his forces all together, himself was the only mark which the enemy would shoot at, before that he cut over the K straights of Gibraltar to Gades, he brake up his whole army, and sent them away here and there to their severall Cities, both to save themselves within the walls, and to defend the walls by force of arms. Scipio, lo loon as he perceived that the war was thus divided into lundry parts, and that to lead about his forces from City to City, was rather a long and tedious peece of work, than either difficult or much availeable, retired back. But became he would not leave that country clear in the hands of the enemies, he fent his brother L. Scipio with 1000 of oot, and 1000 horiemen, to affail the mightiest and wealthiest City in those parts, which the barbarous people call Oringis. This City is leated in the confines of the Meleste (a nation meer Spaniards) the soil fruitfull, and the inhabitants there find filver mines. This was the fortress of Astrubal, and his place of fafe retreat, when he made outroads all abroad into the midland countries of the maint and spoiled the people, Lucius Scipio having pitched his Camp under the said City; before that he entrenched and blocked the town, fent certain to the gates, who by parling near at hand, might feel and found the dispositions of the Citizens, and perswade with them to make triall of the Romans friendly alliance, rather than their forcible violence. But perceiving by their aniwers no mind at all nor inclination to peace, he cast a trench, and raised a double rampiar about the town, and divided his army into three parts, to the end that one of them should ever so low the assault. whiles the other twain took rest and ease. And when the first troop and regiment of them began to give a camilado, there followed a fierce, cruell, and doubtfull skirmish. For they could not eafily either come under the walls, or bring scaling ladders to set to, by reason of the shot that light upon them, And such as already had reared up ladders to the wall, some of them were pushed off to with certain forks provided for that purpole, others were caught hold of with iron hookstrom above, and were in danger to be hung up in the air, hoifed aloft, and fetcht over the walls. Sapio seeing that the conflict was unequall, by reason of the small number of assailants, and that the enemies had the advantage befides, in that they fought from the wall top; caused that first regiment to retire, and with the other twain at once gave a fresh assault to the town. This stroke for great a fear into them who were already wearied with fighting, that not only the townimen inddenly abandoned the walls and fled, but also the Carthaginian garrison souldiers, for fear lest the City was betraied, for look also their stations and places of guard, and gathered themselves into one place. But then the townsmen were affraid, lest if the enemies put themselves within the City, they should be massacred every where as they came in their way, without respect and w difference who were Carthaginians, or who were Spaniards. Whereupon they fet one gate open on a sudden, and in great numbers ran out of the town, bearing their targets before them, against the darts that were shot afar off, and shewing alost their naked right hands, in token that they had laid aside their swords. But whether the enemy could not well discern them so broff, or whether they suspected some crasty and deceitfull practice, I wor not, but they fell upon these that fled and yielded unto them, and flew them downright, as well as if they had affronted them in the face of a battell, and at the same gate entred the City with bloudy banners. In other parts likewise they fell to hewing down the gates with axes, and to break them open with crows of Iron. And as every horseman got into the City, he rode amain (according to the direction given by the Generall) into the market place, to be possessed thereof. And to these horsemen were al- O figned the Triarii for aid and affiltance. The Legionary fouldiers besides ran over all the other parts of the City, spoiling and killing all that ever they met, save such as defended themselves with their armour. All the Carthaginians were taken prisoners and committed to ward, likewise of townsmen about three hundred, such as had shutthe gates; but unto all the rest the town was rendred again, and each man had his own goods delivered and restored unto him. There were flain at the affault of that City, of enemies almost two thousand: but of Romans not above fourfcore and ten. As by the winning of the town, they that were imployed there took great joy and contentment : so in their return to their Generall himself, and the rell of the main army, they made a goodly shew as they marched with a mighty multitude of prisoners led before them, Soinio having praised his brother in the most honourable ferms that he could devise, and namely, for this exploit of forcing Orinx, making him equall in glory to himself for the conquest of Carthage: because winter drew on that he could neither give the attempt upon Gades not yet follow at once upon the army of Afterbal, to disperied as it was in jundry parts over the Province, conducted his forces back again into the Province of Spain, that lifeth on this fide lberus: and when he had dismifted his legions into their several standing camps to winter in, and sent his brother L. Seipio to Rome, together with Hanno the Generall of the chemies, and other Gentlemen prisoners, he B withdrew himself to Taracon.

In the same year the Roman Armado being set out under the conduct of the Admirall M. Valerius Lavinus the Pro-Conful, made avoyage from Sietly into Affrick, and forriged all o.et the Territories of Mica and Carthage, infomuch as they drave booties out of the very utmost Confines of the Carthaginians, and even about the walls of Mica. As they failed back for Sicily, they were encountred by the Carthaginian fleet, confiffing of seventy long thips of wer whereof leventeen were boorded and taken, four funk in the deep fea, the rest were purto flight and diperied. Thus the Roman Captain Valerins, after victories archieved both by sea and land, returned with rich prizes of all sorts to Libbaum: and hereupon by reason that the seas were open and cleared of the enemies ships, great store and abundance of grain was brought to

In the beginning of that summer wherein these things happed, P. Sutpitius the Pro-Consul, and King Attalus, after they had wintred in Agina, as is abovefaid, with a joint navy paffed over from thence into the Island Lemnos. The Romans were twenty five Galliaces of five tanks of oars, and the King had thirty five. Philip for his part because he would be ready at all assais to oats, and the king had thury hve. Philip for his part because he would be ready at all assais to meet with the enemy either by land or sies, went himself in person down to the sea-side, as far as Dimetrial, and made proclamation; that all his forces should by a certain day meet together at Leville. Upon the fame that went of the Kings copining, there repaired sundry Emballies from the consederate States of all parts unto Dimetrial. For the Actionans have greated fundry Emballies from the consederate States of all parts unto Dimetrial. of an hour have intelligence, to foon as the enemies went about any trouble whatfoever, But H t e Roman Generall, and King Atralia, passed the seas from Peparethus to Nicea, and from thence failed with their A mado to Euban, unto the City Oreum, which as a man beareth his course from the gulph of Demetrias to Chalcis and * Enripse, Is the first City of Eubad that sheweth is felf upon the leit hand. And thus it was agreed between Arralus and Sulpitius, that the Romans should give the affault from the sea side, and the King with his forces on the land. Four dates after the fleet was or ised, they presented themselves before the City to affailit, For that time between was bear in lecret talk and conference with Plater, who was appointed by Philip governor and Provost of the City. The City had within it two Citadels, the one commanding the fea. the other fituate in the very heart and midft of the town. From thence there is a way under the ground that leadeth to the fea:at the end whereof there frood a fabrick or tower five frories high, a fingular bulwark and place of defence. There at first began a most sharp and cruell conflict, bu reason that the turret was well furnished with all kind of shot and artislety: and likewise from out of the ships there was planted much ordnance, and many engins bent to impeach and affault the same. Now when every mans mind was amuzed, and eye fixed upon this hot and eager fight, Plator received and let in the Romans at the gate of the other Citadell that flood over the lea and so in the turning of an hand it was surprized and won. The townsmen being expelled and chaled from thence, retired and betook themselves into the middle of the City unto the other fortreis. But certainfouldiers were fet of purpole there to thut the gate upon them: and fo being excluded they were killed and taken prisoners in the midit between. The garrion of the Macedomans flood round together under the Caftle wall and neither fled openly amain nor yet began & to hight as if they meant to flick to it unto the end. For whom Plater obtained pard on of Sulaitim, and having embarked them, brought them to Demetrium of Philiers and there for themafhore and himself returned to Attalus.

Sulpitius bearing himfilf bold for this fo good and speedy success, immediatly failed with his victorious Armado against Chalois. Where the event in the end answered nothing unto his hope and expectation. the Opuntians, for that being able to hold out the fiege untill his coming, fo foon as they faw the enemy they presently had yielded themselves in a manner voluntary into his hands. When he had fet things in order at Office and thereabout he took his journey to Torone. Attalus at the first rerired himself to Orenne: but upon the news arrived how Prufine the King of Buthynia had invaded the frontiers of his kingdom, he left the Roman affairs and the Ætolian war, and from thence failed over directly into Afia, Sulpitius also retired his navy unto Legina, from whence in the beginning of the spring he haddeparted and taken his voyage. And Philip forced and won Torone, with as small ado'as Attalus before had taken Opus. That forelaid City Torone was inhabited by certain that were fled and driven out of Thebes in Phithiotis. For when the City was taken by Philip, and they fled for protection unto the Ætolians, (to whom they recommended and com-R mitted themselves) the Atolians gave unto them that place to seat themselves in, being a City wa-Red and in manner defolate by the former war of Philip. Then Philip having recovered Torone again, as is aforelaid, departed from thence, and won Tritonum and Drymas, two small and base towns of no account in Daris. From whence he came to Elatis, where he had given commandment, that the Embassadors of Ptolomeus and the Rhodians, should give attendance untill his coming. Where, as they were treating about the making an end of the Etolian war (for a fmuch as those Embassadors to the same effect had lately presented themselves at Heracles, in the Councill and affembly of the Romans and Ætolians Itidings came, that Machanidus purposed and determined to let upon the Eleans, as they were preparing to exhibit the folemn Olympian games, Phithe supposing it good to prevent that, courteously answered the Embassadors and gave them their c dispatch: laying that as himself was not the cause of that war so he would not hinder and stay the conclusion of peace upon any equal and reasonable conditions. And so with a power lightly appointed he marched through Beoriato Megara, and from thence went down to Corinth: where having furnished himself with victuals, he marched forward to Phlios & Phaneus, And being now come as far as to Erea, and hearing therethat Machanidas upon the rumour of his coming for fear was fled back to Lacedamon, he returned to Agium, unto the generall Diet and Council of the Achai: supposing withall, that he should find there the Punick armado, which he had sent for to come thit fier; because he might be able to do somewhat also by sea. But some sew daies before the Carthaginians had failed over into Phocaa, and from thence were gone to the havens of the Acarnanians, so soon as they heard once, that Arralus and the Romans were departed from Ore-D som, feating that they would make our after them, and left they should be overtaken and surprised within Khimp, which is the very mouth of the Corinthian gulph, Philip verily grieved hereat, and was wonderfully troubled in mind, feeing what hafte foever he made himfelf in all his emprifes, yet he came too short and effected nothing in due times as if for tune in taking all things out of his very eye, fight, had deluded, disappointed, and mocked all his speediness and expedition, Howbert, in that folerno Diet and affembly, he diffembled his grief, bit in his passionate affections, and thus with an haughty mind he spake and said, "That he called both God and man to witness, that he "had forlet no opportunity of time nor vantage of place, but when and wherefoever he heard but "any inckling of the enemy, and the least ruffling of armour, thither he had made all haste that " possibly he might: but he could hardly deviseand conceive, whether himself were more ventu-E " rous in feeking war; than the enemy nimble and quick in avoiding the same, So Attalus at Opus, " fo Sulpitius at Chalcis, and fo the other day Machanidas eleaped out of his hands and got a-"way But firely (quoth he) his running away will not alwaies profeer and speed well : neither is "that to be counted a dangerous war, wherein a man may be fure (if he but meet his enemy once) "to have the upper hand. That which is the principall point of all, thus much have I got yet at "the enemies hands, that they confess thereby, how they are not able to make their parts good er with us and I doubt not, but shortly I shall atchieve the victory of them, and the event and for-" tune of their fighting with me, shall be no better than their present hope. The Kings allies were glad to hear him speak thus. Then he retired unto the Acharans, Erea, and Triphilia, and delive-red again Aliphera unto the Megalopolitans; for that they proved by good evidence, that it beplonged by right to their territory and confines. Thus having received of the Acharans certain ships; to wit, three Galliaces of Carvels of four banks of oars, and as many gallies of two ranks, from thence he cut overto Amiogra. And then with feven Carvels of five ranks of oars, and more than twenty barks belides, which he had fent into the gulph of Gerimb to joyn with the Carthaginian navy, he mide fail to Erythru in Etolia, nearanto Eupalini, and there disbatked and landed his men. But the Æsolians were advertised aforehand of his arrival and coming ashore: for all the people that inhabited either the country towns and villages, or the Castles near to Potidamia and Apollonia, were fled into the mountains and woods. As for the carrell, which in that hurry and hafte that they made could not be driven away with them, those they preyed upon and brought them to the thips. With the eard all the reft of the booty he feat Nicias the Prator of Sthe Achains to Agium, and fent forward to Corinth: and from thence he commanded that the land forces should be conducted and march by land through Bootia: whiles himself failing from Cinchrada long the coast of Action, above the point or cape of Saniam, passed eventhrough the midft of his enemies armados, and arrived at Chalcis. Then after he had commended the Citizens there for their fidelity and vertue, in that neither fear nor hope was able to change and turn their resolute minds, and exhorted them for the time to come; to continue fledfast in their alliance and allegeance, if they made more reckoning of their own fortune, and loved it better than the condition of the Oritans and the Opuntis he failed from Chalcie to Oreum And when he had commit- 14 ted the government of the State, and the guard of the City, unto those principall Citizens, who choic to flie when the City was loft, rather than to yield themselves unto the Romans, himself patied over from Enbau unto Demetrias, from whence at the first he took his voyage to the aid and forcour of his friends and Allies. After all this, having appointed and fet out at Cassandra keels for an hundred long thips of war, and taken up a number of thipweights to finish out the reft of the worksleeing that all Greece was now in quiet, both because Attalus was departed from thence, and also for that himself had in good time succoured his allies and confederats, who were in some trouble and distress, he returned back again into his own Realm, for to make warmon

In the latter end of that fummer, wherein these affairs thus passed in Greece, when Q. Fabiu 1 Maximus the father being tent as Embassador from M. Livius the Consul unto the Senat at Rome. had brought word and made report, That the Coniul judged L. Porcius with his legions to be fufficient for the Province of France, and that himself might well be spared, and depart from thence, and the Copiular army withdrawn out of those parts: the Lords of the Senat gave order and determined that not only M. Livius, but C. Claudius also his Collegue, should return to the City. This difference only between the one and the other appeared in the decree, in that they gave direction, that the army of M. Livius should be brought home, but the Legions of Ners should remain still in the province, and be opposed against Annibal. The Consuls by entercourse of their letters passing between, agreed thus together, That like as they had with one mind and consent made war and managed the affairs, so, albeit they were in divers parts far afunder, yet they K should meet in one place, and at one time make repair to the City of Rome: and that whether of them twaincame first to Preneste, he should there attend the coming of his Collegue. And it fortuned to, that they arrived both upon one and the same day at Preneste, From whence they fent an edict before, that the third day after the Senat should generally assemble together in the Temple of Bellona: and so they were met upon the way with a multitude of people, who accompanied them as they returned into the City. And they were not content all of them in generall to falure them and welcome them home, but every man was defirous particularly to take the Confuls by their victorius right hands some with congratulations, wishing them joy, others with thankfgiving, acknowledging, that by their good means and vertue the Commonweal was preferred and fet upright. Now when they had related in the Senat house (as the manner was of all Gene-L tals) what acts they had atchieved, and withall demanded, that for their valiant and faithfull fervice to the Commonweal first, due honour should be rendred to the almighty gods, and then they themselves allowed to enter the City in triumph; the LL of the Senat made answer, That they for their parts were ready and willing to confider first and principally of the merits and goodness of the gods, and next and immediatly of the good deferts of the Confuls: and as they decreed divine processions and supplications in the name of them both to they granted triumph as well to the one as to the other. But the Confuls, because they would not divide their triumoh (fince that they had managed the wars with one accordand common confent) thus agreed between themselves, That for a much as the battell was fought within the Province of M. Livius. and the very day of the field tought, it fortuned to be his turn to take the fign of birds, and to have the entire rule; and befides, the army of Liques was brought back and came to Rome already, but that other of Nero could not be removed out of the Province: therefore M. Livius should ride in a chariot drawn wish four steeds into the City, with his fouldiers following after and C. Clandins prefently come after mounted on horseback without his fouldiers. Thus the triumph was communicate to the one and the other, and encreased the glory of them both, but especially of him, whom he more that he exceeded his Collegue in defert, the more he yielded and gave place unto him in honour, " Lo faid every man, He there on horseback travelled in fix dates space the whole "lengthiof leady from one end to the other, and tought the very fame day with banner displaied egainft Aftenbul in Good, when as Annibal thought verily he lay encamped againft bim within a supplied to the supplied of the one part of had and no contill, in the defence of the one part of had and no contill, in the defence of the one part of had and no contill, in the defence of the one part of had and no contill, in the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contill on the defence of the one part of had and no contilled the defence of the one part of had and no contilled the defence of th "the other, against two Captains nay, against two noble Generals of two armies in one placeen "ployed hisadrice and counfell, and in another opposed his body and force, of arms. Now the time drew near of election of new Magilirates: and when it was thought good by the Senatuhat a Dichacor should call that folemn allembly for the faid election; C. Clandim the Comul nominated for Dicator his Collegue M. Livius, And Livius named Q. Cecil us General of the horsemen. So there were created Cominis by M. Living the Dictator, L. Veturins, and Q. Cecilim even he who then was Generall of the Cavalry. After this, they went to the election of the R Pretors, and chosen there were, C. Servilius, M. C. Cilius Metellus, T. Claudius Afellus, and Q. Manlius Thurins, who then was Ædile of the Commons.

When these elections were finished, the Dictator having resigned up his office and dismissed the army by vertue of an act of the Senat took his journey into the Province of Tufcam, to fit in commission and make enquiry, what States either of the Tulcans or Umbrians, intended and plotted to revolt from the Romans, and to turn to Afdrubal at his coming into those parts: and who they were that had affined him either with auxiliary fouldiers, or with victuals, or with any aid and help what loever. And these were the acts for that years as well at home as abroad in the

The great Roman Games were wholly renued and fet out again three times by the Ædiles of C the chair, Cn. Servilius Capio, and Serv. Cornelius Lentulus. Likewife the pastimes and plaies, called Plebeii, were once fully requed and exhibited again by M. Sempronius Matho, and Q. Manlius

Thurinus Ediles of the Commons.

In the thirteenth year of the lecond Punick war, when L. Veturius Philo, and Q Cecilius Metellus were Conjuls, both of them were appointed by the Senat to make war upon Annibal in the Province of the Bemii. Which done, the Prators cast lots: And to M. Cecilius Metellus fell the jurildiction of the Citizens ; to Q. Manlins, of the forreiners, C. Servelins his lot was to govern Sicity, and I Clinding Sardinia As for the armies, they were divided in this manner: one of the Confuls had the conduct of that which was under C Claudius the Confut of the year before. The other Conful had the leading of that (namely, two full legions) which C. Claudius the Pro-Prator before D commanded, M. Livingas Pro-Conful, whose government was prorogued for another year, received the charge of two legions of voluntaries in Hetruria, at the hand of C. Terentius the Pro-Prator, And Q. Manlins was appointed by a decree of the Senat to deliver over his jurisdiction to his Collegue, and to take the charge of Gallia with thefortes there; whereof L. Porcius the Pro-Przetor was Caprains; and he had in commission to waste the lands of those Gauls who were revolted to the Carthaginians upon the coming of Aldrubal; C. Servelius was affigued with the power of the two Cannian legions, to defend Sindy, like as P. Manlins had before. Out of Sardinia the old army was withdrawn; which was under the governance of A. Hofilius: and the Confuls enrolled one new legion, for T. Claudius to fail over with Quimus Ctandius, and C. Hoftilius Tubulus, had both of them their commissions newly lealed for one year longer, the one to govern Taren-E tumiand the other so tule Capua, M. Valerius the Pro-Conful, who also was Admiral for the seacoast and giver along Sicily, was commanded to give up thirty of his fail unto C. Servilius, and with all the reft of the blaye to return to the City of Rome.

As the City, was in inference and flood doubtfull for the variable event of fo great a war, attri-buting, because of all weat and wee, of profesticy and advertity to the gods; behold many prodigious tokens were separted to have happed; Namely, That in Tarracina the Temple of Jupiter, and at Sarvious she Chappel of the goodels Maura, werd blafted with lightning from heaven, And the inhabitante of Samidan were no less terrified with two serpents that were crept into the temple of Jupiter at the very doors, From Antium there was word brought, that the harvest folk as they were as a ping inited attains ears of domobloudy. At Corethere was a few that fair owed a pig with two heads, and the harm peaned a lamb both male and lemale. It was reported alfo, that af Albathere were two rimes from and suffregella by night the day light appeared. Alfo in the territory of Romer by St pairs and the spairs, and the alter of Napune within the Cirke Flaminia brake out into much fweatt anthahalbemplancif Coire Salus, and Quirinus were blafted and fmitten from heaven. The Confels were sommanded to explate and purper these seatfull fights with facrificing of greater heafts and the trains up placet to have day. Which was done according to the derite of the Senar. But above all the would bus lights, taken reported from abroad, or seen at home, the minds of men were put initiar; for the going out of the fite in the Chappell of Vefts. For which cause the Vestall Vingin who had the charge that night to look unto it, was by the commandment of P. Licinias the Bishop well and throughly it ourged. And albeit this happed by humane hegilgetice and that the gods portended poshing thereby yet it was thought good that an expla-E Honghercof should be made with greates facifices, and a folerin supplication held in the Chappel

Before that the Confuls went forth to the wars, they were put in mind by the Senatto take regardand order for the Commons, and so procure their reducing again into the country, and plachigging in their lands and launs. For leeing that by Gods goodness the war was removed far from Romerand Latinas, sho country rowns might be without fear of danger inhabited and frewhether day in neither wasit's meet thing, that they should have more care to inhabit Sicily than

mong the Ro-

Italy. But the matter was not early to becompassed and effected by the people, for that many of the stree-holders were consumed up in the wars and great startity there was of servains and hines to till the ground: besides, the cattell was driven away in booties, and the manor houses were either ruinate or burned. Howbeit, a great fort were compelled by the authority of the Consuls to repaire again into their country habitations. The motion hereof was first occasioned by the Embassadors of Placentia and Cremona; who made complaint, that their territories were much dammified and wasted by the incusions and rodes of the Gauls their next neighbours bordering upon them: and that many of their own naturall inhabitants were fled and gone away, so as their Cities were not well peopled, and their country lay waste and defert. Wheteupon Maissus the Prattor had commission to defend and guard the Colonies from the enemy. And the Confuls by vertue of an act of Senat made an Edick and Proclamation, that all Citizens of Cremona and Pla-1 contia, should by a certain day return into their Colonies, And then, they themselves in the beginning of Spring took their journey, and set forward to war.

Cecilius the Col received the army of Cl, Nero: and L. Veturius of Q, Claudius the Pro-Prator, and made up the full number of all the companies with those new souldiers whom he himfelf had enrolled. The Confuls led their army into the territory of Confentia, and having forraged and spoiled here and there, and being heavily laden with good booties, they were in a narrow and fireight passage much troubled by the Brutii and the Numidian archers : infomuch as not only their prizes were in danger to be loft, but they themselves that were armed in some jeopardy. Howbeit, the alarm was greater than the skirmish, and the booty being sent before, the legionsescaped fafe into places of fecurity, And fo from thence they went into the Lucans country, All that K nation without any fight returned under the obedience of the Roman Empire. With Annibal that year was nothing done : for neither he himself made offer of war, upon the fresh hurt and lois received as well in publike as private, nor the Romans provoked him as long as he was onier. For they were all of this judgment, that there was such metall and valour in that one commander, although all things else about him went to wrack, that they held it no good policy to provoke him, and wake a fleeping dog. And verily I wor not what to make of him; whether he were more to be wondred at inadverfity than in prosperity. For why? watring as he did in his enemies land for the space of thirteen years, so far from home, in much variety of fortune, with an army not confishing of natural Citizens and subjects, but mingled of a confused riff-raff-and medley of all nations having neither the same laws, nor manners, and customes, nor language; diffe- L ring in fashions, in habit, in apparell, in armour, in rites, in religion, nor ferving, as it were the fame gods: he had so knit and united them in one link and streight band that they mutined rejther among themselves, nor against their Generall, not withstanding oftentimes there wanted money for pay, and victuals in their enemies country: for default whereof in the former Punick war, many outrages were committed both among Captains and fouldiers. But when Afdrabalthe Caprain together with his army was defeated and overthrown, in whom they reposed all their hopes of victory, and when they were fain to quit, as it were, all Italy befides, and to retire themselves into an angle and corner of Brutium; who would not think it a marvellous matter, that there was no ftir nor commotion in his Camp? confidering that over and befides all other difficulties, he had no means nor hope elle to maintain his army, but one of the Brutians confi-M try : And say, that it were all wholly tilled, sowed, and well husbanded, yet a small thing it was to find and feed to huge an hoft. Moreover, a great part of their youth was fer away from the tillage of the fields and grounds, and wholy employed in warfare: to fay fiothing of the naturall guife and corrupt ulage of that nation, which in time of war was wont to live and maintain the fame by robbing and thieving. Neither had he any factour at all fent from home out of Carthafe whiles they all were findious and careful only to keep Spain, as if all had gone well with then

In Spain the fortune was in some respect all one and the same, in other fagunlike and different the same, in regard that the Carthaginians being defeated in a sought field; and having soft field. Captain, were driven to the atmost coast of Spain, even has far as the Creanise : different; in this N Spain is a country more apt and commodious to the region; as for the nature of in this, but also than any land in the world, as well for the fire of the region; as for the nature of this fellow. For although it were the first nation of all the maintand continent; where the Romani went first in hand withall to reduce into the nature of a Province: yet it was subdued, and but lately in our daies even under the conduct and happy fortune of Applies Cafar. There at that time Alambat the son of Gige; the greatest and wooked Captain in all their wars of next after the Barchin house) returned from Gadas; and hoping by the help of Magic the son of Amilian; to wage war after, took multers throughout the farther part of Spain, and a med to the number of first thouland foot, and 4500 horse. Mod as for the Cartyla, all writerish manner do agree: but for the In'antry, some write, there were 70000 brought unto the City Silpia. O There upon the open plains fact their two Carthaginian Captains down, because they would not seem to fall off and refrise bartell.

Scipio, when news came unto him of to puillant an army levied, supposed that neither with the Roman legions he was sufficient to match such a multitude, unless he opposed the aids of the Barbarous nations, if it were no more but for shewand outward appearance enory yet was to repose such affured considence in them, as in the sundamentall strength of his army, that in case they

But when the ignadrons which flood ready appointed in their guards and flations, were had brought forths and after them, the fouldiers also from their work and fortheations were willed to take arms; and till more and more continually came fresh and in heart, in place C of those that were weated, ho as now from all parts of the Camp there was gathered rogerher'a ind power and rain to the bartel; then the Carthaginians and Nomidians turned their backs plain and Bed, And at the full they went as ayay by troops and companies, keeping their order and array affili, and dang dishanded Joschuist or teat, thus flerwards, whose the Romans began once more eagers to play upon the hindrooft of them, lo as now their futious violence could no longer be related then without all regard of trutes on their futious violence could no longer be related then without all regard of trutes on their futious violence could no longer be related then without all regard of trutes on their futious violence could no longer be related to the without all regard of trutes and the series of their futions of their futions were more enounged, agond deal, and the generics hears much did yet for certain disks enoung there per created actuations and his kerings animatured by the horizones of those that were flightly armed. Now, when by their fution is the more than the long of the series of their were flightly armed. Now, when by their fution is the more flower and the first and the series of their serve the changes when the day dreet constitute Camp, arranged in the series of their serve the changes when the day dreet constitute Camp, arranged in the series of their serve the changes when the day dreet constitute Camp, arranged in the series of their serve the changes of their servers of the full power and ran to the battel; then the Carthaginians and Numidians turned their backs plain and fled, And at the fift they went an by troops and companies keeping their order and array fill, and not disbanded to haite or leat, but alterwards, when the Roman pegan once more eahim to draw it at length on the right : with direction also unto them that they together with the te light horsemen and light appointed footmen should encounter and close with the enemy, before that both battels might meet and joyn together. Thus having enlarged out at full their wings, they with three (quadrons of footmen and as many corrects of horfemen, together with the light armed skirmilhers, advanced with full pace directly afront the enemies whiles the reft followed fidewaies across. Now there was a void piece of ground in the midst between, by reason that the Spaniards enigns went but flowly forward: and the wings had been in conflict already, when the flower and firength of the enemies battell, confifting of old beaten Carthaginians and Affican foundiers, were not yet come within the darts short neither durst they pur in to succour them that were in fight, for fear they should open the main battell for the enemy that came directly against them. Their wings were much distressed in the fight on every side : For the horsemen, the light ar- r med fouldiers, and the skirmishers, having wheeled about and fet a compass to environ them ran upon them on their flanks. The cohorts of footmen charged upon them afront, and all to break off their wings from the body of the battell. And as now in every respect the fight was unconall. so the rabble of camp-followers, Balear Islanders, and raw untrained Spaniards, opposed against the approved Roman and Latine fouldiers, pulled down afide. The day went on still, and Aldrubathis army began to faint: and no marvell, for they were furprised and taken on a sudden, betimes in the morning, & were forced in haste to enter into the field & go to battel before they had refreshed and strengthered their bodies. And to that purpose Scipio had drawn the day on length, & trifled out the time that the battel might be late, For it was the leventh hour or one a clock after noon! before the enfign of footmen charged upon the fide points. And a good deal later it was ere the K main battels fought and joyned together: fo that the heat of the noon fun, the pain of long flanding in armor, and hunger and thirlt came all together to enfeeble and ipend their bodies, before that they came to hand-firokes and to buckle with their enemies : which was the cause that they stood leaning and resting themselves upon their shields. And over and besides all other troubles, the Elephants also affrighted and madded with this tumultuous and disordered manner of fight of horiemen, skirmishers, and light armed souldiers together, ran from the wings, upon the mainbattel. The Captains therefore themselves being thus tainted; as well in courage of heatt; as in bodily firength, gave ground and retreated. How beit they ftill kept their arraies, as if the whole band had retired whole and found by the commandment of their General. But when the winners and conquerers on the other part were fo much more forward to charge upon them more hotly on L every fide, because they faw them to lose their ground and shrink back; fo as their violence could nor well be endured; then albeit Afdrabal held themftill together, and did what het dill to flav their flight, crying oftentimes aloud unto them, that these were hills behind them, and places of fafe retreat, if they would retire in good fort, moderately, and in order; yet when they faw their enemies preis fo hard upon them; killing and hewing in pieces those that were next unto them, fear was above shame, and so immediatly they shewelt their back parts; and ran away all aconce as fast as they could. Yet at first, when they came to the root and foot of the hils they began to make a frand, and rally the fouldiers again into order of battel, feeing the Romans to hiske fome flay of advancing their enfigusup the bill. But afterwards, when they perceived them to come lustily forward, they began again to flie afresh, and so in sear were forted to take their Camp. M Neither was Scipio himselffar from their trench and rampier, but in that very brunt had been ma fler thereof, but that immediatly upon the hot gleams of the fum, when he minetir in a water sky full of black and rainy clouds there powred downfuch a store of showers and tempers, that hardly could he himself after his victory recover his own camp. And some there were also that made it a cruple and matter of conference to attempt any more for that day. The Caft baginish, although they had great reason to repose themselves, and take their necessary rens; in well had they were with travell, and sore wounded, especially seeing the night was come, and the nomin tain continued: yet, because their sear and present danger wherein they frood gave their bottle to loyeer and slack the business, against the next adoming that the enemies should early affail their Camp, they gathered up stones from our of the values near about them, and bring them N one upon another, amended the heighth of their rampier, purpoling to defend their letter by the fireigth of their fence, feeing small help and remedy in force of arms. But the falling away of their Confederats was the cause that their departure and flight from thence, seemed mote late than their abode there would have been. This revolt was begun by Manet, a greet Lord of the Turdetans: for he with a great power of his followers and retainers fled from the Carthaginishs to the adverse part. Whereupon two strong walled towns, together with their gartifons, we will ded by the Captains unto Scipio. Adveta therefore, searing least this mischier might spread fatther, now that their minds were once set upon rebellion, dislodged about the midnight following and removed. Scipio to toon as he was advertised at the break of the day, by those that kept flanding watch in their flations, that the enemies were gone; having fent his horfemen before, O commanded the flandards and enfight to be advanted, and led for freedy a march, that if they had gone flraight forward and followed their tracks diffe elly, they flactify doubt overtaken them: but believing certain guides, that there was a shorter way to the rivet Bate, they were adviced to charge upon them as they passed over. But Hall what seeing the passage of the riverstopped against him, turned to the Ocean and even at the first they departed in great hafte, as if they fled, which was the cause that they got the flart of the Roman legionary footmen, and won a good

A space of ground before them. But the horsemen, and light appointed sootmen plaied one while upon their tails, flanked another whiles their fides, and by this means, with charging and recharging they wearied them and staied their match. And when as upon many of their troubles by the way, their endens were fain to fland, and forced to maintain skirmith, fome time with the horiementand fontimes with the light javelottiers and auxiliary footmen behold the legions also came on apace and overtook them. Then there was not fo much fighting and refiftance, as maffacte and Saughter of them: down they were with them and killed them like sheep, folong, until their Leader himfelf began to flie, and escaped into the next mountains, together with 7000 half naked and unarmed. All the rest were either slain or taken priloners. Then the Carthaginians began to B encamp and fortifie in all hafte and timulenous fort upon the highest mount they could find: from whence (by reasonthat the enemies had affaied in vain to get up the hill, having so difficult an ascent) they had not so much ado to defend themselves. But, the place being bare and naked. and disfurnished of all commodities for their reliefe, they were not able to hold out the fiege for a few daies. And the respon the fouldiers fell apace to forfake their own Captain, and to go to the enemy. So that at the length the General himself in the night season abandoned his army, and having got shipping (for the sea was not far off) he embarked and sled to Gades, Scipio being advertized that the Captain of his enemies was fled, left with Syll. was ten thouland footmen, and a thouland horsemen to continue the sege of the Camp, Himself in person with the relt of his forces within feverty dajes returned to Taracan, for to examine and hear incontinently upon his C arrivall the cames of the Princes and States: that upon the true ellimate of their deferts they might be rewarded or chaftised accordingly. After his departure, Mafanifa having had secret conserence with Syllania, about inducing his people also to be pliable and to hearken unto a change, passed over into Affrick with some imall retinue. At which prefent time verily the occasion of his sudden alteration was not to evident and apparant, as afterwards his most constant truth and fast alleageance observed unto his dying day was a good proof and argument, that even then he entred not into this defignment and action, without good and important caule. Then Mape, in those thips that, aldrub. I had fent back, passed over to Gades. The remnant, thus forlorn of their Captains, some by way of voluntary yielding and ranging themselves to the adverse part others by slight, were stattered among the next D Cities, and no troop remained of them behind of any mark and reckoning to speak of, either tor number or frength. In this manner and by these means especially were the Carthaginians driven all out of Spain, by the conduct and happy formue of P.Scipio, in the thirteenth year of the war, and in the firsth of Scipio his government in that Province and command of the army. And not long after Syllanus returned to Taracon unto Scipia, and brought word that the war in Spain was fully ended. And L. Scipio was fent with many noble persons captives, as a messenger to carry tidines to Rome of the conquest of Spain, And when all other took ful contentment and infinite joy at these news, and abroad in all places highly magnified theglory of this service, he alone who was the man that did the deed (as one who had an intatiable defire of vertue and true honour) made but small reckoning of the recovery and winning of Spain, in comparison of those matters E that he hoped for, and conceived in that high and magnatimous spirit of his, which be carried with him. For now he cast in mind and aimed at the conquest of Affrick and great Carthage: and therewith, to make perfect and confummate that glorious war to his own immortall honour and renown. And therfore, supposing it was now a good time to begin the way to those high exploits, and to lay plots, to prepare aforehand, yea, and to win unto him the hearts of the Princes and nations, he determined first of all other to found and assay King Syphax; This Syphax was King of the Mafafili, a people bordering upon the Moors, and abutting upon that part of Spain especially where new Carthage is situate. At the same time the King was in league with the Carthaginians: which Some supposing that he would observe no more surely and precisely, than commonly the Barbarians use, (whosefidelity dependeth upon Fortune) fent C. Lalius with rich p gifts and prefents, as an Orator to rreat with him. The barbarous Prince was glad hereof, both because the Romans then prospered every where; and also the Carthaginians in Italy lived by cause the Romans then, prospered every, where: and also the Carthaginians in Italy lived by the loss; and in Spain went down to the geoused, where they had nothing let: and thereupon he condestended to entertain the stiendship of the Romans. But for the constitution of this amity, he neither would give not take affurance, but only in the personal personal entering the Roman General Romans, and the Kings royallaword and watrant that Seipio might come unto him with sale conduct and security, returned noto Seipio. Now for him that aspired to the conquest of Assiriak in was a matter of great consequence and importance in all respects, to make himself since of Spybans, the most mighty and pusifiant King of all that Land, who had aforetime since proof what the Carthaginians could do in war, and the confines and marches of whose kingdom lay fitly upon Spain, and but a small arm of the sea between, Seipio thinking it therefore to G be a matter worth the adventure with great hazard, (for otherwise it might not be) leaving sorthe desence and guard of Spain L. Marrison T. Taraon, and M. Spilasus at new Carthage, whether she had travelled by land from Taraon, and taken great journies) shimself and Lasus togesther loosed from Carthage with two great Cavels of she banks of oars, and passed over into Assirtics, through the calm and still sea, mosk of all rowing, and otherwhile also making sail with a gentle ven with feven gallies of three course of oars, and rid at anchor near unto the shore for to be set to a land. When he had a kenning of the two Carvels aforefaid, which albeit no man doubted her they were enemies, and might have been boorded by them being more in number, before they could gain the rode; yet hereupon enfued nothing eife but a tumult and hurry among the mariners and fouldiers together, in vain preparation of their ships and their armour. For the wind being somewhat big and high, drave the Carvels with full fail out of the main sea into the haven hefore that the Carthaginians had any time to weigh anchor: neither durst any of them proceed to further dealing within the Kings Rode, So Aldrubal first let a shore, and within a while Scipio and Lalius landed and went all to the Court. Syphax took this for a great honour done unto him (as indeed it was no less) that there were come to him at that time, and in one day two Generall Captains of two molt mighty and puilfant States to fue for peace and amity with him. He invi- I ted both of them friendly, and gave them entertainment: and fince it was their fortune to enter under one roof, and the same house for to be lodged in, he endeavoured to draw them to a parley, and to make an end of all quarrels, grudges, and controversies between them. But Scipio denied flatly, "that either there was any private malice or hatred between him and Afdrubal that should " need an end with conference and speech: and as for State-matters, he might not treat with a or professed enemy as touching them, without express warrant and commission from the Senate. But when the King laboured greatly with him, that he would find in his heart and not think much to bear Afdrubal company at meat and meal (because he would not seem to exclude either of them from his boord he yielded thereunto, and was content, So they supped both twain together with the King, and Scipio and Afdrubal fate both at one table in one mels, and upon one bed, for K fo it was the Kings pleature. But so courteously Scipio behaved himself (as he was a man that naturally knew how to carry himself with a grace and dexterity in all things, and in every place wherefoever he came) that by his fair language and eloquent speech, he won not only the favour of the barbarous Prince Syphax (who before was not acquainted with the Roman fashions) but also the good will and love of Asarabal, a most malicious and mortall enemy: who seemed to have him in more admiration upon this one meeting and communication in presence personall, than for all his feats of arms atchieved in war, and made no doubt but reckoned fully that King Syphax and his Realm would prefently be at the devotion of the Empire of Rome. Such a lingular gift had that man to win love and favour. And therefore the Carthaginians were not to much to feek how Spain was loft, as to confider and think how they might keep and hold Affrick. For L thus they conceived, That this noble Knight and worthy Roman Captain was not come thither wandring at a venture, nor as a traveller to fee countries, and to folace himfelf with walking along the pleasant and delectable coasts, leaving the Province which he had newly subdued, leaving his armies which he commanded, failing thus with two ships only into Affrick, and committing himfelf unto an enemy country, and into a Kings hands, of whose fidelity and protection he had no experience: but no doubt upon some great hopes to compaisthe conquest of Affrick. And this was it that long fince Scipio had in fecret purpole and defignment, this was it that openly he fretted and flormed at, namely that he warred not himself as well in Spain, as Annibal in Italy. Well, Scipio having concluded a league with Syphax, departed out of Affrick; and notwithstanding he was toffed upon the fea with variable winds, and those for the most part boisterous and raging yet up. M on the fourth day he arrived at New Carthage.

As Spain generally was at peace and rest for any Carthaginian war, so it was well known, that certain particular States, in regard that they were touched with the guilt of trespasses committed, were quiet for fear, rather than for any loyall alleageance. Of which the most notorious, as well for their own greatness and power, as for their fault and transgression, were Illiturgum and Cafulo. The Castulonians had been Roman Confederates in time of prosperity, were revolted unto the Carthaginians, upon the defeat of the two Scipios and their armies. The Illiturgians belides their revolt and rebellion, added this wickedness, in that they betraied and murdered the Romans who fled unto them for fuccour after that overthrow. These two nations, if Scipio at his first coming had proceeded in rigour to revenge (whiles the States of the country stood in the N pense)he should have regarded their desert more than his own good and commodity. But when all troubles were composed and reduced to quietness, he thought it then a convenient time to punish and chastise them accordingly. And therefore he called L. Martisse from Taracon, with 2 third part of his forces, and fent him to affail Coffulo. Himself with the rest of the army marched toward Ill. surgum, and within five daies presented himself before it. The gates he found shuragainst him, and all preparation and furniture for defence and to withstand the assault. For their confcience bare them witness what they had deserved, and there needed no other desiance of intimation of war against them than the privity of their wicked fact. Hereupon Scipio took occasion to exhort his fouldiers, and began in this wife. "The very Spaniards themselves, quoth be by "with them in more hoffile malice and deadly hatred than with the Carthaginians, For with "them the quarrel was maintained, as it were, without anger and rankor, only for foveraignty and "glory: but of these men ye are to take vengeance for their disloyall treachery, for their cruelty "and wicked villany. And now the time is come, to revenge not only the unworthy death of " your fellow souldiers, but also the like falshood prepared for your selves, in case your hap had

To these exhotations they adjoyned a tearfall and horrible curfer to as many as either for hope of life, or upon timoroulnets of heart &fear of death, should alter their mind and refolution. Whereupon all at once they rulhed out of the gates fet wide open, and with a mighty turnult and shout; made a fally. Now there was no set guard and station of any force oppoled to relift them, because the enemies feared nothing leffe, then that they durk once iffue forth of the gates. Some few toops of horse and the light armour, of a suddain were sent out of the B camp to make head; and they encountred them. Between whom there was a skirmish hotter and sharper in regard of courage and violence, then ordered by any skill and good government. And therefore the horimen were discomfired, that first presented themselves against the enemy, yea,& put the light armed footmen also in great fear. And farely they had proceeded to have fought even under the very rampiar, but that the main strength of the legions, who had but very small time to be marshalled and arranged, put themselves in array and came into the field. And yet for all that, they were diffressed for a while about the entigns, by reason that they ran as blind mad men in their furious fit & sa bold as witheffe fools for want of fence, even upon the fword and their own deaths. But afterwards, the old experienced fouldiers, having flifty thood out against the first rash brune and violent shock of the enemies, yea, and killed the formost, bridled and staied the rage of those C that feconded them : and when they affaied with in a while after, to enter forward themfelves & break in upon them, & faw none of them to give one foot of ground, but every one resolute to die in the very place where he stood, they opened their battell in the mids (a thing that they might cafily do. confidering the multitude of the fouldiers) compafied and environed the wings of their enemies, who fighting round in a ring, unto the last man were flain every one. Thus were they that were in arms and made refiftance manfully deale withall by their enemies according to the rigge of war, and in the angry mood of fouldiers; and such was their end. But within the City there was fouler work, and a more cruell butchery and flaughter committed, when the feeble unagened and naked multitude of women and children were murdred by their own neighbours and citizens, who having let the forelaid pile of wood on fire fell to maffaces them, and flung their bodies when D they were but half dead, into the light fire under them ; loss their firesms of bloud gufbing out of their veins, were ready to quench the flame beginning to break forth. And in the end, when they themselves were even wearied with the pittiball dengines of their own friends, they caff them felires armour and all into the mids of the taid fire. Whee this mutiesce was done and ended. the Romans entred the City with victory. And at the first fight of this mentions object, they wondred for a while and flood aftonied. But afterwards when they faw the gold and filver glittering within the heap among others goods, they were ready and defirous (as the nature of man is greedy of such things, to rake and pull the same out of the sire; but some of them were caught with the same and burne; exhers flashed and half sugged, with the bot steam of the vapour and breath illining from the light fire, such (I mean) as were formore, & could not retire themselves back. than might frand with the duty and modelty of fonldiers : yes, and the Sentinels and corps de quard would not flick to give reproachfull terms and tanking words to the Tribunes or Marshals, when they went the round : and some of them made no bones to enter by night into the peaceable territory about them, for to fetch in booties and prizes; untill at length openly at noon day, they departed from their colours without pasport and licence. All things they did as transported away with luft and felf-will of fouldiers, not guided by the order and discipline of warfare, nor directed by the commandment of their captains and rulers. Nevertheleffe, there was retained fill a form of Roman camp among them : and that upon this only hope that the fouldiers had of the Tribunes aforefaid : whom they supposed in time would come to the bent of their bow, enter into the fame furious courses, and have their hand in the mutinies, and follow them in their rehellion; and therfore they were well content with them to fit judicially in Marihall court, lintheufaell place of Principal to minister law and execute justice : alio to call for the watchword and fignall of them, yes, and orderly to go to their watch and ward in their course and due times. And w whereas in very deed they had caft off all reverence and obedience of government, yet they would feem to shew a kind of loiall and dutiful diligence; in that (for footh) they would be commanders of themselves, and keep some order without constraint. But in the end the mutiny broke out into open ledition : namely, when they perceived once, that Tribunes milliked and reproved their doings and endeavoured to crofic their delignes; yes, and denied firstly and openly to tak part with them in their follies and furious outrages. Whereupon they differzed the Tribunes of their judiciall places in the Principia, yea, and dispossed them quite of all room in the camp, and by a generall conferred the foversign rule on two common fouldiers, the captains of this their feditious commotion, Albim Calenn, and C. Arrius Vmber, Who not contented with the * markes and ornaments of the Tribunes, were to bold as to handle the rods and axes; eventhe L very rotall entigns of foveraignfule; beyer thinking how those knitches of rods, and axes sticking within them, which they cauled to be born afore them to the fear of others, were ready to light upon themiclees, to icourge their backs and ides, and to chop off their own heads not long after, The supposed death of Scipie, whereupon they wainly built, was it that blinded their wils and minds upon the rumour whereof, being already neited abroad, they had no doubt, but ill Span generally would be up in armes. In which garboll and hucliburly, they made reckoning that they might levy monies of the confederat States, and spoil and pill the Cities neer unto them. And amid these troubles, when all were in an uprore, and every man would venture to do every thing at his pleasure, then they supposed their own deeds and actions would be lesse espied and marked Now when as they looked every day still to hear fresh newes, not of his death only, but also of his M funerals; and feeing there came none at all, but rather, that the former tidings were checked and proved but a flying tale without head or foot, then they began to make femblance of enquiring after.& feeking out the first authours who raifed those false reports then they seemed to be singly also and offended with them, to the end, that they forfeath might be thought rather to have believed things inconfiderally, than to have devifed fach a matter themselves purposely. These leaders and captains thus disappointed and abandoned, began now to dread and faind in horror of this it own enligns of magiltracy that were carried before them, and in Read of that imaginary pule which they murped, they teared greatly, that the very edge indeed of the true and lawfull power of authoritie would be shortly turned upon them. As the sedition was thus dashed, by detailed, that it was credibly and for certain reported, first, that Scipio was living; and within while N after, that he was recovered and in health : there came feven Tribunes or Colonels, Tentho Solpinhimfelt. At whole first arrival at the camp, the fouldiers grew piece angrid and within then before : but anorsupon sais words and speeches, where with the Coloniels entertained shole of their acquaintance, with whom they had communication; they were well contented and appealed. For first shey went about to their pavilions from one to another, and afterwards to the Principia and the Pretorium, where they disputed to fpic forite knots of folddiers that together and talking one with another a and fo spake unto them; as if they rather questioned with them what the cause should be of their anger and suddain commercions then blamed them, or laid any action to their charge. The reason commonly pretended, was this, that their Wiges was not duly paid at the day. Befides, they alledged what whereas at the Ame rime, when upon O "the trecherous fact of the Illiturgitans, there followed the loffe and death of two Generals, and the defeat, of their two armies, they be their versue had defried the Roman name and ho "nour, and like wife keprahe province to their behoof the Miturgit Mit had hideed received con-"dign punishmention their offenbo and trespaller that there was delicated and required and re-"compensed themefor their good fervice accordingly." Beleeve the (lay they again) your complaints are just and requests reasonables and we will make relation Mercel to the Lord Grandle 44 and glad we are in our hearts, that it is no worle, and that the cale is no more incurable then it is

A " for God be stracked, P. Sopra and the common-week, are both sufficient and also willing to make " you smeats for all."

But Scipie, a man though used to the wars, yet also gather innecessainted with florins of fouldiers mutnies, was much tousles in fpire and perplexed, for fees the stuy might exceed meature in stanforting of himself past his bounds in punishing; for the present he thought good to deal genicle with the this still, as he had begun, and tent abroad the collectors about the Tributary Cities to gather up the revenues, thereby so put them in good hope of pay, and shat with speed. And hereupon there went an edde and proclamation, that they should repair to satisfact the call for their wages, either by companies apartone after another, or skogether in general, whether they would themselves.

And now by this time, the fudden pacification of the Spaniards that were about to rebell. filled the fedition of the touldiers quite, which of it felf began to cool and flake already. For Mandons se and Indibilis, after it was reported that Scipio was alive and livelike, gave over their enterprite, and were retired again within their confines. So as now the fouldiers had neither Citizen nor forceiner to take pare with them in their folly & furious rage. And when they had cast all about what courie to take and what this to make, they found no other evation, but the most common refuge and retreat of all lews countels and bad defignments, even to commit themselves either to the jult wrath of their Generall, or elfe to his elementy and mercy, whereof they were not path all hope and in utter despair. For why ? he had not pardoned even the very enemies, with whom he had fought in battell. And as for their mutiny, it was as yet without bloodfhed, and no hure C done : and as it felt was not cruel and outragious, fo it had deferved no extream and rigorous punifhment . thus reafored they and comforted themselves, as naturally men are too prompt and eloquent, to extenuate, to publish and cloke their own faults, more I wor, then they should. This was their only doubt, whether they were better to go by cohorts and iquadrons; or all at once to command their pay. In the end they were of opinion, that the fafer way was to go all in one train. At the very lame time, whiles they among themselves laid their heads thus together in the camp. there was a councel held at new Carthage about them, and much dispute there was, and variety of opinious, whether they should proceed against the heads and Captains only of the seditious (who were in number not above five and thirty) or by cutting off the greater fort to punish this to odious example and prefident, of a rebellion rather then a mutiny. But the milder fentence took place, namely, that from whence the offence began, there the punishment should reft. And for the multitude, lome chaftilement and rebuke was lufficient for their correction. When the Councel was diffurified and broken up, to the end that it might be thought abroad that they fat about nothing elle but this which they protended, they published an edic throughout all the army in Carshape for an expedition or journey against Mandonim and Indibilit; and gave commandment to make provition of victuals for certain dales. And thole leven Tribunes, who had before gone to Sweet for to appeale the mutiny there, were now fent to meet that army again and having five name sobece given them of the principal authors of the forefaid tumult, they had a direction unto certain meet persons for the purpose, to thew them good countenance, to speak fair unto them. and courteoully to invite them bome to their boules, and afford them kind and friendly enterteinment , and after they had made them good cheer and brought them to bed, to take them being fall affeep apop their liberall drinking of wine, and to bind them fare hand and foot Now when they were not far off from Carebage, they understood by those whom they met and encountred upon the way, that all the whole army, was the next day following to fee forth against the face ans : which tidings not only tid them of all fear, which feeretly furprifed and poffesfed their minds, but allo made them exceeding glad and foyous, for that they supposed their General being now left alone wish then forces, they might do with him what they would themselves, rather then be at his commandment and devotion. And about fun-letting they entred the City, and perceived the other army providing and making all ready for the volage above named. Received they were and welcomed with gentle words, devited and framed on purpole raunely, that the L. Generall P took great joy and contribute ment for their coming, for that they were come to just before the fetting out of the other army ; and lo they went to repole and make much of themselves. And without any fift and thinliff at all, the ringlesders of the fedition, were by the means of thole Tribuns entertained and lodged in the houles of certain perions of good behavior and meet for that purpole, and there apprehended and imprisoned. At the reliefe of the fourth watch, the cariages of that army, whole expedition was presented, began to let forward on the Journey's and somewhat before day the Itandards and emigris advanced but the whole army was deteined and flaied at the gares, and persain warders ient to keep all the pallages and wayes; that no man thould go forth of the City. Then were those fouldiers who came the day before summoned to an aulience i and they tan boldly into the market place to the Tribunal of the General, (as if S with their outertes and clamours they would have put him in fome fear and dread of them. And at poetime both the Lord Generall himself in perion affected up the Tribunall, and with all the signed foundiers were brought again from the gate, and enclosed round about at their packs the mourned multitude guthered together to hear an Oration. Then were they danted, as luity as they were before, and all their college cooled ; and as they confelled afterwards themselves) nothing territed them to much, as the heldenful thrength and frell colour of the L. Generall beyond all their expectation, whom they thought verily to have found fick and cratic: yes, and his counrenance and face to vigorous and counsgious, as they never remembred to have feen him to H lufty in any battell before. For a while he tat fill and faid never a word, untill he was advertised that the Captains of the mutiny were brought into the place and all things elfe in readings Then after filence made by an Oyez of the cryer, in this wife he began and faid. " I would never have believed that I should have wanted words and proper language unto " mine own army : not because I have exercised my felf at any time rather to make eloquent " speeches then to manage valiant actions, but for that being alwaies from mine infancy almost " trained up in the camp, I have been acquainted with the natures and humours of touldiers. He had fearce made an end of his speech, when all at once, according to the order given before- I hand, there was presented to their eies and cars a terrible and fearful object on all fides. For the army which had environed the affembly round about clattered their fwords & bucklers together-The common crier was heard to cite by name all thole that were condemned there, in the prefence of the whole audience. Stripped they were naked, and haled forth in the mids of themall, and every thing brought out at once for to accomplish the execution. Thus were they bound to the flake, whipped with rods, and their heads chopped off. So benummed they were all and aftonied for fear, that were prefent at the fight thereof, that there was not heard amongst them all one fbrewd & hard word, in milliking the rigor of the punishment, no, nor so much as one grone or fecret figh. Then their bodies were al drawn at one fide, the place was made clean, & purged & at the fouldiers were called by name & before the Colonels & Kn. Marshals, iware alleageance, and K to be true fouldiers unto Scipio. And every one according ashe answered to his name, had his wages truly paid. This was the iffue and final end of the fouldiers mutiny, which began at Sucre. At the same time, Captain Hanne tent by Mage from Gades with a small power of Africans?

follicited the Spaniards about the river Batis, for mony, to rebel and put in arms upon a four thonfand able men. But afterwards he was forced by L. Martius to quit his camp, and having loft the greatest part of his men in the very tumult of taking the camp, yea, and some in the flight, whom the horimen purfued in chale and flew as they ran ftragling, himfelf with few others escaped away. Whiles these things hapned about the river Batio, Laline in the mean time having passed through the ftreights into the mein Ocean, arrived with his navy at Cartoia. This is a City ffunding on the fea coaft bounding apout the Ocean, even in the mouth of the river, where it first openeth from the fireights into the breadies. Now shere was fome hope (as hath-been aforefaid) to gain the City of Gades without any affault, by treaton, for as much as there can't fome into the Roman camp, that of themselves made offer and promite thereof. But the treafor brille forthico foon and was revealed before it was ripe, the comparetors were all apprehended ; eith feat by Mago unto Adberbal the Pretor, forto be conveied to Carthage. And Adberbal Berting embarked shole traitors is a Caravet or Gallion of five banks of ours, and lent her afore, because the was flower of fail than those of three banks; himself with eight three-banked gallies, followed a prety way after. The faid Caravet of five course of ours, was not so soon entred the straights, but Scipio also being embarked in another Caravel of the same fort, made out of the haven of Carais with leven Gallies of three ranks of oars and invoked Adberbal and the forefaid Gallies : sup-M poling verily, that she enemies Caravel being taken tardy in the very current, was not able against the tide to reire. . saberbat being thus furprifed on the fuddein, for a while flood in fear and doubt what to do , whether he had belt to follow on after his own Caravell, or turn the prowe and beaks of his gallies, and make head against the enemy. Thus whiles he stood at a bay lingring, he loft the opportunity of shifting and avoiding a battell: for now they were come within the dark that, and the enemies on every fide were ready to charge. And the current was toftrong that shey were not able to rule and manage their ships assurey would. But the manner of fight was no thing at all like to'a fea-battell, for as much as they could do nothing to their mind, nothing by this and dexective nothing by couniel and advice. The nature onely of the narrow feat the violence of the surrent was all in all, and ruled the conflict, driving the thips one against anothery as well up. N ontheir own fellows as upon their énemies : netwithitending they rowed and laboured what they could to the contrary. So as one while ye thousatise a thip that fled and foudded away, whirled about back again with a witnesse by the waves, upon those that had her in chair a and likewise another that feemed to follow and purfue after benemin, if the happed once into a contrary course of billowes, to turn top and tail, and seem to flie. And in the very conflict to fellout, that when as one veffell ran with her beak head fall butt upon another, the was forced by waves to turn her fide, and receive in her flank the push of the enemies. And contrariwife, when as one by with her flank opposite to the enemie, suddenly all at once fhe flould wind and white again upon her prow. As the gallies fought thus doubtefully together, hap hezard, at the pleasure and will of Fortune; the Roman Caravell (were it because of her weight the was able to stand more O fleady against the surging billows, or by reason that the had more ranks of oars thet cut the waves, and to was more easily ruled) chanced to inference of the imalier guilles of the enterings; and running falt by one with a forcible violence wiped away clean all the cars of one fide, and had no doubt spoiled and marred all the rest that she would have invested and charged upon, butthat Adherbal, with the other five made fail, and got over into Africk! Lalim hoving failed back to Carreia with victory, and heard what had been done at Gades inamely, how the complet of

The Oration of & Fabius.

Q. Fabins being demanded his opinion, spake to the matter in question to this effect. "Right honourable and my LL of the Senat, I know ful well, that many of you here affembled " are of this mind & verily periwaded, That we are fer this day to no purpose, but even to consult 64 & debate of a matter clearly determined; & that in vain he shall spend words, who shall deliver " his advice of the Province of Affrick as of a point as yet doubtful & not refolved upon already. "For mine own part, first I cannot conceive neither will it enter into my head, how Affrick can N "possibly now be accounted as a Province & assigned certainly unto your Col. (let him be a man " right hardy, & of as much valour as may be) confidering, that neither the Senat unto this daybath " judged it nor the people ordained & affigned it to any person in the nature and name of a Pro-"vince. Furthermore, if it were so indeed without all peradventure; then it my indementate "Col, hath done amils, who in making semblance to put a matter for to be debated, which is al-" ready agreed upon hath deluded and mocked the whole Senat, and not the Senator, who in his "course delivereth his opinion of the thing in question. But I am affured that in gainlaying and "croffing this hally voyage into Affrick, I shall incur the finisher opinion & surmite of two things: "the one is of my usual lingting and slow proceeding in all mine actions (a course that naturally I "am given unto) which young men may term at their pleasure, timorouspels and lazinels; but so Q " long as I have no caule to repent therfore, I pass the less, For furely hitherto the advices of others "have ever at the first fight made a goodlier shew, and seemed more honourable; but by experi-"ence mine own waieshave sped better, and been sound in the end more effectual. The other is, of backbiting detraction and envying at the glory and reputation of the Cof. a man of fingular "prowels (I mult confess) se whom I fee to grow from day to day in greatness and honour. From "which jealousie and suspicion, if neither my life passed, and the carriage of my self; if neither my

For what concurrence and emulation can there be between me "and him who is not of equall age with my very fon? When I was Dictator, in the vigour and "flower of my strength, in the very course and train of my greatest and bravest exploits, no man "either in Senat or in the affembly of the people, heard me to refuse and deny, That my own Gc4 "neral of Cavalry, who could not afford me a good word, but ever railed at me, (a thing that was " never heard before) should be made equall with my self in command and government, And yer B "by good deeds rather than by fair words, I effected and gained thus much in the end, that he, who in the judgment of others was matched with me and made my fellow, confessed within a "while himself to be my interior. "of all others at this day most flourishing in the eyes of the world: unless for footh it be a likely "matter that I (a man weary not only of managing affairs, but also of this world, and of this life) "should look to have the Province of Affrick offered unto me, if it were once denied him, Nay " verily, I have enough already: in that glory I am content to live and die, and feek for no more. "It was sufficient for me to hinder Annibal from atchieving the victory; to the end that by you. "who now are gallants in the best of your strength he might be vanquished & overcome, Meet it C " is then and great reason O P. Unless that a man would say that Amilear was a warrior and Captain worthy to " be preferred before Annibal; or that war of more importancethan this; or that victory greater "and more honorable than this is like to be, in case it happen that we may be conquerours under " your conduct, and whiles you are Conful. Whether would you chuse rather to have drawn A-"milear away from Drepanam & the mountain of Erga, than chased and hunted the Carthagini-"ans and Annibal out of Italy? Nay furely, even your own felf (howfoever you embrace glory al-"ready won, than hoped for hereafter) would not take more joy & contentment, and triumph ra-E "ther for freeing and delivering of Spain than Italy from the wars. Annibal, I wot, as yet is not "come to that low ebb nor so down the wind, but that he which made choice of another war, "may feem well in fo doing to stand as much in fear and dread, as in contempt of him, Why then "address you not your self to effect this impress, and leave building these Castles in the air, and "hope by fetching these reaches and this compass, & going the longest way about that when you "are passed over into Affrick, Annibal will follow you thither; and not rather go the next way "to work, and fight with Annibal where he is, and make no more ado? Are you willing indeed "and desirous to win this honour of dispatching quite the Punick war? Why, it is the course of " nature to defend and make fure your own before you go in hand to affail the dominions of others. Let us have peace first in Italy before we make war in Affrick: and let us first rid our selves "of fearere ever we take occasion to put others in fear; unless we had some greater quarrel, And F "if by your conduct and fortunate government, both these may possibly be effected; conquer "Annibathere, and then go thither to affail Carthage a Gods name, Butif the one or the other of " these victories must needs be left for new Consuls to atchieve: as the former of the twain will "be the greater and more memorable, so it will open the way, and give the overture unto theo-"ther ensuing upon it. For at this time, over and besides that our treasure, and all the revenues and "finances of our flate, are not able to maintain and wage two fundry armies both in Italy and in "Affrick: besides, I say; that we want the means to keep two Armados afloat, and have nothing "left sufficient wherewith to furnish them with victuals and municion: who seeth not I pray "you, how far weengageour selves in peril and danger by this enterprise? And why? for footh not because you judg it good for the common-weal. " but because you think it an enterprise that may import you in great honour and glory : like as " when you being captain Generall of the people of Rome, left your province at random and your "army at fix and leven, without warrant of law, without order or act of Senat, hazarded in two bothoms the whole flate and majefty of the Empire of Rome; which at that time together with "the danger of your life, incurred the perill and jeopardy of the maine chance. To conclude for " mine own part (my LL. of the Senat,) am of this mind, and this is my conceit, that P. Cornelius "was not created Col. privatly for himfelt and his own behoof, but for the good of the common-" weal and us all ; and then the armies were levied and enrolled, for the guard of the City and de-" fence of leafy; and not for the Coff. in their proud felf-conceit & overweening of themselves. D "after the manner of absolute KK to transport & lead into what parts of the world they lift themfelves. When Fabius by this oration (premeditate and framed to the time) had through his surborie ty land the long fettled and comfirmed opinion that men had of his wifedome, drawn unto his fide agood part of the Senat, and especially the ancients; insomuch as the greater number commended and the grave counsell of the old man, above the lufty and youthfull courage of the other gallant: then Scipio by way of answer made these remonstrances, and spake in this wife. "My lords of the "Senat, even Fabius himself in the beginning of his oration, said very well, that his opinion which "he was to deliver, might be inspected of detraction and envy. Of which note, verily I durit not "my telf tax and accuse a man of his quality and reputation to much, as methinks is not fo well " elected as it ought to be the very suspition it felf : and I wot not whether it be by a default of his E "efected with tought to the the thing it felf is fo pregnant. See cothis, I say, and be well advised, that it be not a shameof full reproach to lay, that P. Licinino the Conful, a man of fingular valour (who because he is the shigh Priest, and by were ne therof, not to absent himself from the solemn celebration of facrifices and divine lervice, was content and willing, that the charge of to diffant a province frould B controllitation him by cashing lots) is not able to perform that, now when Annibalis half defested, and his heart shifoft broken, which your felf was sufficient to effect when Annibal squara red it ont, and braved all kaly like a conqueror. But let the case, and suppose I say, that by this courfe which I mean to take, the war be never the sooner brought com end : versurely it were for the honour of the people of Rome, and for the reputation and name which they have among forrain princes and States abroad that they may fee and know, that our hearts ferve is c. not only to defend Haly out also to offend Africk. And that it might neither be thought, and bethe leeved not spoken and notifed abroad in the world, how no Roman captain durst adventure that Kewhich Amibal hath already dared and done: and when as in the former Punickwar, when all the quarell was for Sicily, our armies and armados fo often affailed Africk: now that Itely is in C. question Africk should festill, and be at rest. Nay, rather let Lay be at repole and quiet now ar laft, after to long stavell and affliction and let Africk in her turn be fired and forraged another while, Let the Roman camp be pieched rather under the very wals and gates of Circhage, then we fee once again from our wals the trench and rampier of our enemies, to inveft our Gity. Let Africk bethe fet place and feat of the war, let fright and flight, forraging and harrying of countries, revoltand rebellion of allies, and all other inconveniences and enormities that follow war, which have lien heavy upon us thele 14 years, turn from us thither. great concourse of people and exceeding applaule and affectionas favour of the beholders, M. Pomponius Ma ho, and Q. Catalus were ient as Embaffadors.unto Delphos, to carry thither an offring and stately gift of the booty and pillage of Afdrabal: who prefented there a crown of gold weighing two hundred pound : also certain counterfets refembling the poils, which were made of filver, amounting to a thousand pound weight, Scipio when he could not get leave granted to levy fouldiers and take musters which he greatly forced not of, obteined thus much yet, that he might have with him in his train voluntary fouldiers : as also receive whatoever the Alies would contribute and give towards the building of new sbips, because he had passed his word, that the City should not be charged with setting out an armado. And first and formost, the States of Harraria promised to help the Conful, every one according to their abillity. The Cærites came off, and granted to purvey corn and all kinds of victuals for the mariners and failers, the Populonians to provide iron the Tarquinians to find fail-cloths, the Volatetrans to fend all ta: klings and furniture belonging to ships, and also corn: the Arctines to confer 30000 targets, as many morions or head-peeces, befides javellins darts faulchions, lances, and pikes, to the full K number of fifty thousand, as many of the one fort as of the other, also axes, spades and mattocks bils, fithes, and hooks, and fickles. meal, troughs and quern mils, asmany as would ferre to furnish forty long ships or gallies: of wheat 120000 Modii, and all voyage provision for the Decurions, pety capitains, Mariners and Ore-men by the way. The Perulines, the Cinlines, the Ruellans offred fir trees for the framing and making of thips, and a great quantity of corn. But for this work, he occupied only the fir hewn out of the publick forest and wasts. All the States of Vmbria, the Nurfines also, the Reatines, Amitemines, and the whole country of the Sabines, made promise to help him to souldiers : the Marsi, the peligni, and Marricines, in great number came of their own free wils, and were enrolled to ferve at fea in the navy. The Camertes, being allies and confederateo the Romans, but not tied to any fervice, fent a brave company of fix L hundred men well armed. And when as there were fet out the keels or bottoms of thirty ships, twenty Caravels of five course of oars, and ten of four, himself in person plied the carpenters and shipwrights to, and set forward the work that 45 daies after the timber was brought out of the wood, thefhips were finished, rigged and furnished with all things, and shot into the water, So to Sicily he failed with thirty long thips of war having embarked therein almost feven thousand of voluntary fervitors. P. Licinius also for his pare, came into the Brutians country unto the two consultarie armies, of which he took unto him and chose that which L. Veturing the Conful had commanded, and suffered Metellus to have the leading fill of those legions, which had been under his couduct before : supposing that he should more easily employ them in tervice because they were as quainted already with his moment of regiment and governance. The Pretors M likewise went into their fundry provinces. And because mony was wanting for to delray the charges, of the wars, the high Treasurers were commanded to make sale of all that track of the Campane country, which from the Greek Fosse extendeth towards the sea. And there was grapred out a commission to give notice of those lands: and look what ground soever belonged to any citizen of Capua, it was conficat to the use of the people of Rame : and for a reward to him. that gave notice, there was affigned the tenth part of the mony, that the land was, rated and prized at. Also C. Servilius the City Pretor, had given him in charge to take order that the Campanes should dwel where as they were allowed to inhabit by vertue of a decree gramed forth by the Senat, and to punish those that dwelt eliewhere.

In the same summer Mage the son of Amilear, being departed from the lesse Baleare Mands where he abode the winter featon, and embarked a choice power of young and luftymen failed overinto Italy with a fleet of thirty ships headed with brazen piked beaks, and many hulks of burden: and there he fet aland his fouldiers, to the number of twelve thousand footmen, and welneer two thouland horse : and with his suddain coming surprised Genua, by reason that there lay nogarrisons in those parts to guard and defend the sea coasts, From thence he sailed along and arrived in the river of the Alpine Ligurians, to see if he could by his coming raise some commotion and rebellion. The * Ingauni (a people of the Ligurians) fortuned to war at that prefent with certain mountainers the Epanterii. Whereupon Mago having laid up and bestowed lafe of the prizes and pillage that, when he won in * Savo (a town upon the Alpes) and left sen ships all O war riding in the river, for a sufficient guard, and sent away the rest to Carthage for to keep the coasts it home (because there ran a mighty rumor, that Seipio would pass the seas, and over into Afrik himself, after he had concluded a league and amity with the Inganni (whose favour be more affected and esteemed then the other) set in hand to affail the mountainers. Befides, his power increased daily : for that the Frenchmen flocked unto him in all parts, upon noise and voyce of his name. Intelligence hereof was given to the Senat by the letters of Sp. Lucrotius who were with their news exceedingly troubled and perplexed, for fear left they had rejoyced in

A vain for the death of Afarabal, and the defeat of his army two years before; in case there should arise from thence another war as great and dangerous as the other, differing in nothing else but the exchange of the General. And therefore they gave order and direction both to M. Lavins the Pro-Consul, to come forward with his army of Voluntaries out of Tuscary into Arimnum: and also unto Cs. Servilius the City Prator, if he thought requisite and expedient for the Commonwealth) to commit the two legions of Citizens attending about Rome, to whomsoever he pleased, for to be commanded, and led forth of the City. So M. Valerius Levinus conducted those legions to Artism.

About the same time, certain hulks of the Carthaginians, to the number of fourscore, were B boorded and taken about Sardinia. by Cn.Oikevius, governor of that province, Calius writeth, that at they were loaden with corn and vickulass sent unto Anmbal. But Valerius reporteth, that as they were carrying the pillage taken in Herraria and certain prisoners of the Ligarian mountainers, into Carthage, they were intercepted and surprized by the way. There was no memorable thing that year done in the Brutians country. The petillence raigned as well amongst the Romans as the Carthaginians, and they died thereof alike on both sides. Mary the Carthaginian army, besides the plague, were affliched also with samine. Annibal passed all that summer time near unto the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he built and reared analtar, and dedicated it with a glorious title of his worthy acts, engraven in Punick and Greek letters.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the nine and twentieth Book.

Aius Laliusbeing fent from Scipio out of Sicily into Affrick, brought from thence a huge booty and declared unto Scipio the credence and message that he had from Malanissa, who complained of him that he had not as yet paffed over with his fleet into Affrick. The war in Spain which Indibilis had raifed was disputched: himself slain in the field: and Mandonius was delivered by his own men into the Romans hands that demanded him of them. Mago, who was in France and Liguria, had out of Affrick lent unto him both a great power of fouldiers, and also money to wage aids with a commission and precept to join himself unto Annibal. Scipio croffed the seas from Syracuse into the Brutii, and recovered the City Locti, after he had discomfited the garrifon there, and put to flight Annihal, Peace was concluded with Philip I he gooddess Dame Idra was brought solemnly to Rome from Pessinus. by occusion of a pro-E phesie found in the books of Sybilla to this effect: That then the forrainenemy might be driven out of Italy, when Dame Cybele of Ida was brought to Rome. And to the Romans she was delivered by Attalus King of Alia. A thick stone it was and nothing else, which the Inhabitants called the mother of the oods: P. Scipio Nafica, the fon of that Cneus who was killed in Spain, judged by the Senat a right good man, one that was very young, and had not been yet so much as Questor, was he that received her: for it was by the Oracle imported, that the said goddes should be received by the best man of the City, and so dedicated. The Locrians sent their Embassadors to Rome, to complain of the outrage and cruelty of Q. Pleminius the Lieutenant : in that he had unjustly taken away the money consecrated to Proserpina, and villanously forced their wives and children. Pleminius was brought boundwith chains to Rome, and there died in prison. There ran a false rumour of Pub. Scipio, (Pro-Consul in Sicily) and spread as far as to the City, That he fould found his time there in riot. Whereupon there were sent certain messengers from the B Senat for to enquire and fee whether those reports were true. And Scipio being cleared from all infamy by the permission and good leave of the Senat Sailed over into Affick. Syphax assigniced and wedded the daughter of Aidrubal the fon of Gilgo: and thereupon renounced clean the amity which he had contra-Hed with Scipio. Masamisathe King of the Massylians, whiles he served in the wars in defence of the Carthagiulani quarrel within Spainafter he had lost his father Gala, was withas disseized of his hing-dom. And when he had oftentimes fought to recover it again by war he was in certain battels vanquished by Syphax King of the Numidians, and utterly deprived of his royall dignity. So with two hundred horfomen he joyned as a banished person with Scipio: and with him, immediatly in the first bastell, he slew Hanno the fon of Amilcas, together with agreat number of men. Scipio upon the coming of Aldribal trainions for of interesting to the agree sumper of men. Since upon the coming of interpolation and Sphanysho were almost 100000 strong was compelled to break up the lings at Utica: and to be for tified a standing camp for winter barbow. Sempronius the Conful had a fortunate battel against Annibal in the territory of Croton. The Cenfors beld a solemn review and purging of the City and numbered the people. In which survey taken there were also shall in their books 215000 Citizens. Between the two Cenfort, M Livius and Claudius Neto there fell out a notable difcord: for C. Claudius took from Livius (companion with him in office) his horse of service : for that he had been sometimes condemned by the people of Rome, and driven into exile. And Livius again did the like by him, because be had born false wheels against him, and not dealt bona fide with him, considering the reconciliation between them, Cipio after he was arrived in Sicily, disposed his voluntary souldiers in order, and enrolled them by Centuries. Over and besides them he had about him three hundred lusty tall fellows for the flower of their age and frength of body, the bravest men of all others: but they wist not themselves for what purposethey were reserved; being neither assigned to any colours under a Captaia, nor fo much as armed at all. Then he made choice from out of the whole manhood and youth of Sicily three hundred men of arms, fuch as for birth and wealth were the very principall and best in the Island, who were to pass over with him into into Affrick: and he appointed them a day, upon which they should all present themselves in readiness, furnished and appointed in the best manner with horse and armor. This warfare so far from home was like to be irksome unto them, and to bring with it much trouble, many difficulties and dangers, as well by sea as land. The consideration and sear hereof mightily disquieted not only the parties themselves, but also their parents and kinsfolk. Now when the day appointed was come, they shewed their horses and armour. Then Scipio made a speech unto them, and said, " That he was given to o understand, that certain Sicilian horsemen stood in great fear and dread of this souldiers as K "being a fore and painfull piece of service: In case then (quoth he) there be any of you so min-" ded and disposed indeed, I had rather you would now presently be known thereof unto me and confess at once, then hereafter to whine and complain, and so to prove lazy lubbers and unor profitable fouldiers to the Common-wealth. And therefore utter your minds in plain terms. "and I will be content to hear you without offence. Whereupon, when as one of them took a good hearr, and said flatly, "That if it lay in his choice freely to do what he would, he was altogether unwilling to ferve: then Scipio answered him again in this manner, Forasmuch assmy "youth) thou haft not diffembled thy hearts grief, but spoken out what thou thinkest, I will soon "depute one in thy turn unto whom thou maiest deliver thy armour, thy horse and other sumiture of warfage, and whom thou shalt forthwith have home with thee there to train teach & I. er exercise himaster thou hast given him thy horse and armor. The young man was glad hereof and accepted the offer upon that condition: and so he assigned unto him one of those three hundred abovesaid, whom he kept about himself unarmed. When the rest saw that horseman in this manner discharged of his service, and that with the savour and good will of the L. General : every man then began to speak for himself, and to make excuses and took others in their stead. Thus for the three hundred Sicilians were substituted as many Romanhorsemen, without any expences at all of the State, And the Sicilians themselves had the charge of infituding and training them up. For the Generall had made an Edict and Proclamation, That who loeyer did not fos thould ferve himfelf in person. This proved by report a brave cornet of horsemen above the rest; and in many battels performed right good ier ice to the Common-weal. After this, he took a furvey of the legi-se gions or footmen: and all those who had born arms longest in the wars he selected forth especially fuch as had been employed under the conduct of Marcellus. For those he well wist to have been brought under the best discipline of warfare, and also by reason of the long siege of Syracuse, to be most skilfull in affaulting of Cities. For now they were no small matters that he had in his head, but he plotted even the very destruction and min of great Carthage. After this he divided his army and placed leverall forces in fundry towns. The Cities of Sicily he enjoyeed to provide com he made spare of that which was brought out of Italy; the old ships he newly repaired and rigged, and with them he fent Leliusinto Affrick for to prey upon the country and fetch in prizes; the new which rid at Panormus he drew up to land, that they might all winter long lie upon dry ground, and be seasoned, because they were made in haste of green timber. When he had prepa-N red all things necessary for war, he came to the City of Syracule, which as yet was not in good order and well quieted, fince the great troubles of the late wars. For the Greeks made claim for their goods granted unto them by the Senat of Rome, which certain of the Italian nation detained and with-held from them by the same violence, wherewith in time of war they had possessed themfelves thereof. He supposing it meet and requisite to maintain above all things, the credit of the State ; partly by vertue of an edict and commandment, and partly by a civil course and process of law against such as were obstinate and avowed their wrongs done, he forced them to make re-Rightion to the Syracusians. This act of his pleased not only them, but also all the states of Sicily; and therefore they were more willing and forward to help him in the wars.

The fame fummer there arose in Spain great troubles, raised by the means of Indbilis the Ilergeet 51 no other occasion or reasion in the world, but because in regard of the high admiration of

The Roman Captains likewise for thir part, L. Lennulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus, lest by neglested of the first beginning the war might grow to a greater head, joyned their forces together, and marching through the country of the Auletans, as peaceably as it they had been friends. (norwithstanding they were known enemies) came to the very place where they were encamped and pitched themselves within three miles of the enemies. At the first they affaired by way of Embaflage to deal with them, and to perswade them to lay ande all arms and hostility but they laboured in vain. Asserwards, when as the Spanish hostemen gave charge suddenly upon certain Romans that were fortaging, the Romans also sent out from their Stations and consequently.

C mans that were fortaging, the Romans alio fent out from their Stations and Corpt de guard their Cavalry to refue: fo the horfemen skirmished, but no memorable act to speak of was effected on the onside or the other. The next morrow by sun-rising the enemies all shewed themselves armed and in order of battel, and braved the Romans within a mile of their Camp. The Austrans were marshalled in the mainbattel; the llergetes in the right point, and certain other Spanish nations of base and mean account in the left: between both those wings and the battel, of either hand they left certain wide and void places, whereas when the time served they might put forth their storiemen. The Romans having embattelled and put themselves in array after their old and usuall manner, yet in this one thing followed the examples of the enemies, in leaving our certain open waies between the legions of the men of arms to past strongh. But Lenistus supposing that the their of the horse-fervice would be advantagious to that part which first thould-send out their

Cavalry into the battell of the enedices, that lay so open with spaces between, gave commandment of Ser. Cornelins a Knight Marshall or Tribune, to will and charge the Cavalry to set to with their horse, and to enter those open lanes between the enemies batteriallons. And himself having sped but badly in beginning the fight with sootmen for rashly, staid no longer, but until he had broughte the threenth legion (which was set in the leftwing opposite to the Hergetes) out of the receward into the vanguard, for for succour and strengthen the twetch legion, which already began to shrink and give ground. After that one other skimish there was equall and sought on even hand, he advanced forward to L. Maelus, who in the forestron of the battell was buse in encouraging his men, and sending imposites on and lending imposites on the strength of the strength of the wine part o him, that all was well and whole in the less point, and that he had sen our Corneling.

as, who with his horfemen; would like a tempethous from come upon them, and foon overcast and beforeadishe enemies round about. The word was not so soon ipoken, but the Roman horfemen were ridden within the thickest of the enemies, and not only disordered the arraies and companies of, the footmen, but also a once shut up the waies and passages that the Spaniards could not make out with their horsemen. And therefore the Spaniards leaving to fight on horfeback, alight on foot. The Roman Generals seeing the ranks and files of the enemies disarraied, themselves in fright and sear, and their ensigns waving up and downevery way; sell to exhorting, yea, to entreating of their own Insanty to recharge them with all their force, whiles they were thus troubled and disbanded, and not suffer them to come into order, and re-enforce

F the battell again. And fürely the barbarous people had never beerable to abide their violent imprefion, but that Indiblis himself their Prince and Lord, together with the men of arms that were now dimounted on foots made head against the ensigns of the footmen in the vanguard. Whereupon ensued a sharp and cruell fight for a good while. At length, when as they that fought about their Prince (who first, although se were half dead yet flood their ground, and afterwards with a javelin was noiled to she earth) were overwhelmed with darts, and sain; then they began to flie on all hands: but the greater number were killed in the place, because both the boriemen had no time nor jone to recover their hories, and mount upon them again and also the Romans preffed so hotly upon them after they were once discomfited, and never gave over until they had stript the enemies quite out of their Camp. So there died that day thirteen thoughand the stream of the prince and the place that day thirteen thoughands.

G land Spaniards, and well near eight hundred were taken pritoners. Of Romans and Allies, not many more than two hundred left their lives behind them, and those especially in the left point. The Spaniards, that either were driven out of their Camp, or escaped out of the battell, first ran scattered and differried over the fields, and afterwards returned every man to his own City where he dwelt.

The Mandonius summoned them to a general councill; where they all bewailed their calamities & milesies, greatly blamed the authors of the was, and agreed in the end to fend their embassis.

fadors to give up their arms, and to yield their bodies. These having excused themselverand laid u the whole fault upon Indibilis & the test of the Princes who were the thirters of the wange were for the most part flain themselves for their labour in the field, yielded up their armour and themfelves, and received this answer from the Romans: That they should be received to mercy; and their submission accepted, if they would deliver alive into their hands Mandouin, and the rest that were the breakers of peace, Otherwise, they threatned to lead their forces into the retritories of the Hergetes and Aufetans, and to forward, of the other nations their complices in that rebellion-With this answer the Orators departed, and related the same in the councilly assembled. Where Mandonius and the rest of their Lords were apprehended & delivered to the Romans for to be ounished and executed accordingly. So the States of Spain obtained peace again; and a double risbute for that year was imposed upon them, and they enjoyeed to provide corn to serve the army to fix months, besides souldiers liveries, short coats, and side cassocks; and they received hostages wellnear of thirty Cities. Thus the troublesand rebellions of Spain being begun and ended after this manner, without any great ado within few daies, all the forte of the war turned upon Affrick. C. Latins being arrived in the night at Hippo Royall, by the break of the day, led forth with banner displaied in order of battel all his fouldiers and mariners, for to harrey and spoil the country. And finding the inhabitants there retchless and careless, and living in security as in time of peace, they did much hurt and annoied them fore, Whereupon the news went in post to Carehage, set all on a hurry & put them in exceeding great fear. For it was reported, that the Roman Armado was arrived, and that Scipio the General was landed (for the rumour ran before, how he was paffed over already into Sicily.) And because they never descried the ships, nor discovered certainly what K power of men invaded and ipoiled the country, they thought the most and doubted the worst as fear commonly maketh every thing more than it is. And to at first they were only affrighted and terrified; but afterwards they grew melancholly and troubled in spirit in these tearms to think, "That fortune should so much be changed, that they, who a little before as noble conquerors had " lain encamped with an army before the walls of Rame, defeated fo many hofts of enemies, and " either by meer force or meer love, held all the States of Italy under their Signory, should now "themselves see the wheel so turn about as they were like shortly to behold the wasting and noise selling of Affrick, and the City of Carthage belieged 1/4 thing that they were never able to en-"dure with that valour and reiolution nor to abide with such firength as the Romans had For "the Romans had ever the Commons of Rome; they had alwaies the youth of Latinh ready at L "hand; who still encreased more and more the new ity, and daily grew in number to make im-" ply, and to repair & furnish out so many armies that were defeated. Whereas, their naturalben-"ple were meither in town nor country fit for fervice, their aids were waged and hired for money " from among the Affricans, a nation like to turn upon any accident, & to change with every gale " and puff of vain hope, and were besides faife and unfaith fut in their promise. For now the Kings at already, Syphax and Majaniffisthe one upon conference with Scipio is fecretly alienated from us inheart, and the other openly revolved in action, and become our most deadly enemy fother there remaineth neither help nor hope for us at all in any place. For neither Mago is able in Gant " to make any commotions and rebellion, nor yet to joyn with Annibal: And as for Annibal him-" felf, he weareth apace, and decareth daily both in fame and reputation, and also in frength and M "forcible means. When their minds being thus disquieted upon those fresh and present tidings, they were fain to bewait and lament their wofull flate, the initiant danger recalled them again to confult by what means they might withfland the imminent perils. So they thought good to take musters in all haste both in the City and the countries by, to send some to levy and wage the rids of the Affricans, to fortifie their City, to bring in store of grain, to provide weapons and amorite rig their navy & to fendit out to Hippo, for to encounter the Roman Armado, Whiles they were deviling thele couries, there came at last a post with news, that it was Lalius and not Seine who was let afhore; that there was landed no greater power than for to make rodes into the county for booties only: and as for the main firength of the whole army, it remained fill in Sicily So they Wad fome respit to breath themselves, & began to address their Embaffies to Syphan and to other M Princes, for to establish and confirm peace and league between them. They dispatched others at fo to Philip, who should make promise unto him of two hundred ratents of silver in case he would rake the feas and pass over either into Sicily or Italy, Melfengers also were fent as far as into Mile by unto their own Generals ferving there, to will them to raife what troubles they could soffilly, for to keep Se pio awork, and hold him backfrom coming into Affrick, And unto Many weeking not only those messengers aforesaid, but also five and twenty long ships of war, fix thousand lost men, eight hundred horsemen, seven Elephants, and great store of treasure besides forto him aids, whereby he might advance forward with his forces nearer to Rome, and joyn with Amalal, Thele preparations were making, and these courses devising at Carthage, when as Mafanifa upon the bruit that went of the arrivall of the Roman fleer, began to flart up and rouze himien; and ac-O companied with some sew horsemen, came unto Labins, busie in driving still great booties out of the country, which he found altogether disfurnished of amour, and unprovided of guards and garrifons for defence. "He much complained that Scipio was fo flack in his affairs, and give-"ved that he had not passed over ere this time with an army into Affrick, whiles the Carchagi-" nians were thus affrighted, whiles Syphan Wastroubled with the wars of the borderers of whom " he was thus much periwated, that if he mighe have refling time to compose his own wants

"to his mind, he would not continue fast unto the Romans, nor deal in any thing faithfully and "foundly with them: willing him to follicit Seine, yea, and to four him on and importune him not to fland longer at a bay and make delayer. And for his own part, not withflanding he were dif-created of his fathers Kingdom, yet he would be ready to affait him with fuch a power of foot and "herized of the sames names and same of advising Lalias withal not to make any longer stay in Africk, ~ S for asmuch as he believed verily, that there was a fleet already set out from Carthage, with "which in the absence of Scipie, he might not with safety enter into conflict and battail. After this communication, Majaniffa was dimified, and Lalius the next day loofed from Hippo, with his ships laden with pillage and prizes: and being returned into Sieily, declared unto Scipio the counsel and credence that he had from Majaniffa. B About the very same time thoseships which were sent from Carthage to Mago, coasting along the Albiganians and the Ligurians, arrived at Gonus, It fortuned that Mago at that time lay with his fleet in those parts: who upon the words of the messengers, & the commission to raise as great forces as possibly he could, immediatly held a counsel of the Frenchmen and Ligurians for of both nations there were great numbers in those coasts. "Where before them all he declared how he "was fent unto them for to fet them at liberty: and how (as they might fee themselves) to that " effect he was furnished with new aid and succour from home. But what forces, and how great "an army was needful for the managing of the war in hand, it lay in them to determine. As for " himself, first and formost he knew ful wel, that there were two Roman armies abroad, the one in "France, the other in Tuskany: and that Sp. Lucretius would joyn with M. Livius: and therefore C "they themselves were to put many a thousand in arms for to make head against two Generals & two compleat armies of Romans. The Frenchmen made answer again, That their will was good enough, and they had an exceeding defire to compass and effect the designment intended: but

"for almuch as the Romans had one camp within their confins, and another in Tuscany neer ad-" joyning, and immannes within fight; if peradventure they should be seen in the action to aid the Carthaginians; incorrinently both armies, as well the one as theother would in all manner of "hostility invade their territories: and therefore they requested him to desire of the Gools such "things, wherein they might fland him in flead fecretly under hand, Asfor the Ligurians, because "the Romans lay far enough off encamped from their Lands & Cities, they might dispose well ewhough of themselves as they lift: and therefore it was good reason that they should put their D " young & able men in atmack bear a part in the managing of the war. The Ligurians refused not, Only they craved respit of two moneths for to take the musters. In the mean time Mago, having cent away the Gauls closely took up acprets forbines throughour their countrey Towns for mo-Marons, Living led his army of Volumeries out of Tufony into France, and having united his forces unto Lucyrius his power, was ready to receive and welcome Mare, if haply he removed out of the Liganians country negret to the City of Rome : but in case Mago kept himself quiet in a comer under the Afra, he minded also himself there to keep his standing leaguer about Arimi-

After the cerum of C. Lalin out of Affrick both Scipio was priched forward by the indigations E and perivations of Mafavila: and also his souldiers, seeing great prizes beought out of the enemies Land, and every (hip traight the rewith ; were mightily incented and for on fire with a burst-ing define to be transported over thither wish all speed possible. But as they were plotting about this enterprise of greater importance, they thought also spon a leffer that came between, namely the sumping again, of the fairy of Loors, which in the general revolt of all Italy, had fided also with the Carthaginians. The first hope that they conceived both to affect and effectively in the production. price grew upons very fast matter; by occasion that in the Brutians comment, she whole man-Puncagers income very just immater; i specession that me the Brutians commen, the whole manmer of text vice, was performed by weap of nobling and noving, rather than by any oxidinary courie

It formsed for the misen formers them were gone abroad a plandring certain Lograns were interested, and brought away with them to they imm. In which muniber of captives are an one cargenters and majors; who as it chances, were hired to work for the Carche-giptum in the Calle of Livin. These were discovered and known by dentain great men, and the ganging criticals of the Lockage, who happed should offer a bandle of persons in Research facility. as hyrthe contrary taction that banded with Amidal and bad delivered Lant into his hands were thren out of the City of India men follow marking with them (as commonly their manner is, G who have been long out of their own Country) of many matters, and among the sult, how all things in real at home with cole, charnell accordinglys and therewith, pur them in fome good house, it shey might be reasteness, for as large; and fencineme again, they would berray the cast again, they would berray the cast again, they would be tray the cast again to the cast again t all things there. malonim and a test bay had given orderhow to mark the fear, and in whicefort; as also agreed upon the figns and tokens which they should mark from on high a far off, they were fent back H again. Then the exiled Locrians repaired unto Scipio at Spracufe, with whom also were others of the banished perions of Louri: and there they related unto him the promises of the captives aforefaid and put the Conful in very good hope that theeffect would be correspondent to their defignment. With them were fent two Tribuns or Marshals, to wit, M. Sergins and P. Matienus with commission to conduct three thousand souldiers from Rhegium to Locri. Letters also were difpatched unto Q. Pleminius the Vice-pretor, for to be affiliant in this action. Who being departed from Rhegium, and carrying with them scaling ladders, proportioned to the height of the Caffle wall fore told unto them, about midnight gave a token by fire to those that were to betray the Castle, from that place which they had agreed upon: who being in readiness also, and looking with for them put down likewife ladders of their own, made for the purpose; and in many places F at once received them that climbed up : fo as, before there was any alarm heard, they fet upon the watch of the Carthaginians, fast afleep as they were, and distrusting no such matter: who first were heard to grone as they lay a dying, but afterwards, to make a noise and keep a running and much ado, upon their fuddain flarting from fleep, all the whiles that they wift not what the occasion was. At length, upon the discovery of the matter, one man wakened another, and every one called aloud to arm; crying out, that the enemies were within the Castle, and the watchmen flain. And without question, the Romans had been put to the worse and deseated quite, being far fewer in number than the enemies, but that there was an outcry and shout set up by them that were without the fortress; which so long as men knew not from whence it came, put them in in geat fear; and the tumult besides by night made every small and vain thing much greater than it was. By means whereof the Carthaginians aftonied (as if all places had been full of enemies) abandoned all fight, and betook themselves into the other fortress (for two there were distant nor far afunder.) The Townimen kept possession of the City, as the prize and guerdon in the mids for the winners. But out of the two Caftles there were light skirmishes every day. Q. Pleminius was Captain of the fort and garrifon of the Romans, and Amilear over the Carthaginians: and both pairs increased their strength, by aids that they had coming unto them from the places adjoyning.

Until at la st. Annibas shewed himself in person; and no doubt the Romans had never been able to hold our, but that the whole multitude of the Locrensians fore galled and grieved with the proud government and the covetous polling of the Carthaginians, took part with the Romans. When intelligence came to Scipio, that the Romans were diffressed in Locri, and that Annibal himself was F. advancing thither: for fear left the garrison also should be in some hazard (as having no ready means to retire from thence) himself leaving at Meffana his brother L. Scipio for the guard of the place, passed over from thence with his vessels down the water, when he espied the current and the tidetogether to serve for a fare. Likewise Annibalhaving sent out a vancurrier from the River Butroins (which is not far from the City Locri) to fignify unto his men, that by day light they should give a hot charge with all their might and main upon the Locrensians and Roman both. whiles he himself made an assault upon the Town behind, not looking for him, but wholly turned away and amused upon that other tumult. Now when as early in the morning he found the skirmilh begun, he was not willing to put himself within the Cattle, for fear of peffering with over great a company the place to threight and of to small receipt: and for to scale the walls they had M brought no ladders with them. So caufing all their carriages and packs to be piled up in one heap together : he presented all his footmen in battail array before the City, to terrifie his enemies withal: and with the Numidian horsemen he made a bravado under the walls, and rode about the City. Whiles the ladders and other ordinance meet to give an affault, were in preparing and making ready, he approached on horseback neer to the wall, for to view on which part above the reft, he might give the affault: and there he was shot with a quarel dicharged from an engine called a Scorpion, which hapned to be planted next unto him. And being affrighted at this fo dangerous an occurrent, he commanded to found the retreat, and fortified his camp aloof without the peril and shor of any dart, Now was the Roman freet from Melfana arrived at Loca, and had the day afore them : fo as they were all fet a land, and entred the City before the him fetting. N The morrow after, the Carthaginians began to skirmith out of the Cattle: and Amibble being now provided of ladders, and having all things else in readings needful for the affault. cane under the walls: with that all upon a fuddain the Romans fee open a gate and fallied out upon him, who feated nothing less than any such accident: and thus fetting upon them at unawares slew two hundred of them. Annibal perceiving that the Conful was there, retired with therei into the camp : and after he had fent a messenger to them that were within the Castle willing them to thist for themselves, in the night featon he dislodged and departed. They also who were in the fore, after they had fet on fire the houles which were in their keeping, of purpose by that tumult to cause the enemy to make some stay and carry behind, ran away in mahner of a rout and before it was night with good footmanship overtook their own company, Scipio seeing as well this Ca-O file quit by the enemy as their camp also empty, called the Locrenfes to a general affembly, and gave them a therp check and rebuked them for their revolt. The principal Captains & Authors of that trespais he purso death; and gave away their goods to the chief heads of the other faction, in reward and consideration of their fingular fidelity to the Romans. But as concerning the publick flate of the Locrisms, be faid he would neither make nor medic therewith, either ingiving to them, or taking ought at all from them, But willed them to fend their Embaffadors to

A Rome, and look what the Senat would award in equity, that fortune they should abide. This one thing he was well affured of that how illforwer they had deferved of the people of Rome, yet they should live in better condition under the fignory of the Romans, provoked to anger as they were, than they had already under the government of Garthaginians, pretending love and amity as

Then himlelf in person cut over to Messana with those forces that he brought with him, leaving Pleminius his Lieutenans, and that power that won the Castle, in garrison for the desence of the City, The citizens of Local had been to proudly mituted, and to cruelly handled by the Carthaginians, after they were revolted from the Romans, that it feemed they could be content to abide any finall wrongs, not only patiently but also willingly, and in manner with a glad heart. But so far

B now exceeded Pleminius, Amilear the former captain of the garrifonito far went the Roman garrifon fouldiers, before the Carthaginians in wickedness & avarice, that a man would have thought they had strove together who should pass the other in sinful vice and ungodlines, and not in seats of arms and prowels. For neither Captain nor fouldier forbare to practile upon the poor Townsmen any enormous facts, which are wont to make the great & mighty men odious unto the poor and meaner persons. They wrought and committed shameful villanies upon their very bodies; upon their wives and children. And their greedy avarice fo far proceeded, that they could not hold their hands from poiling and robbing the very religious and lacred Temples. Infomuch, as among other holy Churches which they polluted, they mer even with the rich measure of Proferpina, which had lien fill in all ages, and unrouched by all others: fave only it was reported to have been

C pilled by Pyrrhus; who indeed carried away the spoil of her, but he deerly bought it, and paid full sweetly for that facriledge. And therefore like as before time the Kings ships shaken with tempeffs, and torn and split with the rage of the Sea, brought nothing at all in that wreck fafe to Land, but only that facred mony of the goddels, which they had ftoln and carried away; even to at this prefent, the very fame mony (but in another kind of calamity and milery) brought upon all them that were tainted in that wicked action of robbing the Temple, a strange & frantick madnels; which caused Captain against Captain, and souldier against souldier, to fare as if they were flark mad, and enraged as mortal enemies one with another. Pleminias had the chief rule and command of all. As for the fooldiers, some were under him, sich as himself had brought from

Rhegium; others were commanded by the Tribuns of Colonels. Now it chanced that one of D Plepsinius his fouldiers had ftoln a filver cup out of a Townsmans house, and ran away when he had done; and the owners after him with hue and cry, and fortuned to come in the way, and to ageer, with Singing & Mariennes the two Tribuns or Colonels full in the face. Whereupon the cup was taken from him by the commandment of the Tribuns; and thence a role first a braul, and some hard words were dealt between; and from them consequently they went to open clamors and loud outcries, until at length there grew a very fray between the fouldiers of Pleminius and of the Tribuss Sand according as they came still one or other in time to help their own fide, both the number and the rior insteaded at once. In the end, Plemmins his men went away with the blows, and mounted themselves unto Pleminius, tunning to him with open mouth and great indig-pation, the wing, their bloudy wounds: and reporting befides, what opprobrious words to his E difgrace had peffed against him without spare, in the time of those brawling fits. Hereupon in a great choler and boyling heat of bloud, he gat him forth of doors in all the haft; convented the Tribuns before him, and commanded them to be ftripped naked, and the rods to be brought forth feady for 19 (courge them, But whiles there was some time spent in turning them out of their apparel & uncasing shem (for they firugled & made resistance, and called to their souldiers for help) al at once they came thick about them (for very lufty they were upon their fresh victory) and rati from all places; as if the alarm bell had been rupg against the coming of some enemies. But when they law once the bodies of their Tribunes rewed with rods, then they fell into far more furious tage and a very fit of madness: and thus incensed as they were, without all regard, not only of the reverent majesty, of authority, but also of common humanity, they fell upon the Lieutenant him-P (elf, after they had most pittionsly beaten and evil intreated his Lictors and Officers about Hirt

Then having singled him our apart from his Ministers and Sergeants, they cruelly mangled him, cut of his note, crops his ears, and left him fordead. News hereof came to Meffana, and within few dayes Street highed him apace to Locot in a gally directed with fix banks of oars : who after due examination and hearing of the cause between Pleminius and the Fribans, acquit Pleminius as innocent, and left bim Governour of the gerifon of the place: but he judged the Tribuns guil-(y, as Maleiactors, and caused them to be bound in chains for to be sent to Rome unto the Senare! and so he securined to Messara, and from shence to Syracusti Pleminius not able to over-rule his anger, and thinking that Scipio had deak but coldly and negligently in the matter, and made too light of the injusty, which he had received, and not purished the oftenders accordingly; and fuppoing that there was no manelifeable to make true estimate of the cause, but he that in his own perion had felt the indignity and hainouine's thereof; commanded the Tribuns to be haled before him; and after he had put them to all the cruel torments) that any mans body it able to abide, he put them to death: and not fatisfied either with their dolorous rorture whiles they were quick, nor with taking their lives from them, cast their dead bodies forth into the fields, there to lie ahove ground subunied: The like cruelty he exercised upon the principal Burgesses of the Locrians, fachas ha heard day weno to Scipio for to make complaine of his wrongs and injuries, And look what foul and shameful pranks he had plaid afore with his friends and allies, proceeding of hist H and coverousness; the same now in his sell and surious rage he multiplied and wrought in divers forts: to as he brought infamy, hatred and obloquy, not only upon himfelf, but also made the world to think hardly, and to speak much shame of the General himself.

Now drew the time neer of the folemn election of Magistrats; when as there came letters to Rome from Pub Licinius the Conful, the tenor whereof was to this effect: That himself and his army were fore vifited with a grievous ficknes : and that he could not possibly have staid there. but that the violent contagion and influence of the fame malady, if not greater & more grievous. had not affailed the enemies. Seeing that therefore himself was not able to come unto the election, he was minded, if it might so stand with the good liking of the Lords of the Senat, to nominat as Dictator Q. Cecilius Metellus, forto hold the toresaid election. And as for the army of Q. Ceci-t lins it was for the good of the Common-weal that it should be cassed and discharged, fince that there was no imployment of them at this present; confidering that Annibal was retired already with his forces into his standing camp, and taken up his wintring harbor; and again, the pestilence grew fo hor in that leaguer of his, that if they were not discharged betimes, there was not one of them like to escape and remain alive. In these points, the LL, of the Senat granted out their commission unto the Consul, for to do according as himself thought tostand either with his own credit and trust committed unto him, or the benefit of the Common-weal,

At the very same time there was a certain religious opinion that had possessed of a suddain the whole City, by occasion of a certain Prophese found in the books of Sibylla. When search was made into them and they diligently perused, about the raining of stones, which happed so often z that year, The Prophese ran in this form: " At what time loever an enemy of a strange and for-"rain countrey, shall happen to make war upon Italy, he may be chaired out of Italy and vanquished if the goddels dame Cybele of Ida, were brought to Rome from Peffinus. This Prophetie found by the Decemvirs, moved the Senat the more, for that, the Embaffadors allo who carried the oblation and present aforesaid to Delphos, related, That as they themselves sacrificed unto Pythius Apollo, all the inwards of the beaft killed for facrifice, appeared good, and shewed prosperity: and the Oracle belides gave aniwer, That there was a far greater victory toward the people of Romethan that was, out of the spoils whereof they brought gifts and offered to the God at this prefent. And for to make up and fully accomplish these hopes, they alleaged withal, how P. Scipio in demanding the Province of Affrica, did prefage (asit were) before-hand in his mind the final end t. of this war. To the end therefore, that they might with more speed obtain this honorable victory thus fore-tokened, and offering (asia were) it felf, by all lucky prelagings of men and Oracles of the Gods, they thought and deviced fome mean to transport the faid goddeffes to Rome.

The people of Rome in those dayes was confedered with no States of Afia: howbest the LL. calling to mind, how long ago, upon occasion of a sickness, and to purchase health unto the people, E culapins was fent for likewife out of Greece, before it was joyned with the City of Rome in any league or fociety; and confidering, withal, that there was some friendship and amily begun already with King Attalus (in regard of the common war against Philip) and that he would be ready to do for the people of Rome, what soever lay in his power, they resolved to send unto him an honorable Embassage to wit, M. Valerius Levinus, who had been twice Conful, and had warred M in Greece; M. Cecilius Metellus, who had been a Pretor, and Servius Sulpitius Galba : likewile an Ædile, andtwo late Questors, C. Tremelius Flaceus, and M. Valerius Falco. For these five they affigned five Quinquerems or Gallies of five ranks of oars, that according to the credit and dignity of the people of Rome, they should make a voyage into those Lands, with whom they were to win a reputation and Majesty to the Roman name and State. These Embassadors, as they held on their course toward Asia, to soon as they were put on Land at Delphos, repaired directly to the Oracle for to know what good hope it might afford unto them and the people of Rome, of effects ing that bufines and commission, about the which they were fent forth. And this answer by report, was returned to them again, That they should obtain their defire, and effectuate their purpole by the means of Attalus the King: advising them moreover, That when they had con N veighed the faid goddess down to Rome, they should take order, that the very best man of all others in the City, should give her lodging and entertainment. But to proceed, to Pergamus they came unto the King. Who having courteously received and welcomed the Embaffadors, conducted them into Phrygia to Peffinus, and delivered into their hands that facred and hely Rone, which the inhabitants of the country faid, was the Mother of the Gods, and willed them to carry it to Rome. Then M. Valerius Falco was fent back from the other Embaffadors to advertise them at Rome, that the goddess was coming, and that they should seek out the best man in alithe City, for to receive and lodge her in his house with all devotion that might be.

Now was Q: Cecilius Metellus nominated Dictator by the Contul in the Brutianstountry, 2gainst the solemn election of the Magistrats. His army was disbanded and casted and E. Veturius O Philo created mafter of the horfe. Then the Dictator held the Election. In which were chosen Confuls, M. Cornelius Cethogus & P. Sempronius Tuditanus in his absence, who ar that time had the government of Greece, After them were elected Pretors, T. Claudius Nero, M. Martius Ralla, L. Seribonius Libo, & M. Pampanius Mathe. When the Election was finished, the Dictator refigned up his place of magiltracy, The Roman Games were thrice renned and fer forth, & the plaies Plebei leven times exhibited. The Ædiles of the chair were Cn, and L. Cornelins Lentuli both. This Lucius 80A verned then the Province of Spain: created he was in his absence, and absent as he was he bare that dignity. The Ædiles of the Commons were T. Claudius Afellus, and M. Junius Pennus. That year M. Marcellus dedicated the i emple of Verine, neer the gate Capena, the seventeenth year after it was vowed by his father at Classidium in Gallia, during the time of his first Conjulship. There died also this year a Flamine of Mars, namely, M. Emylius Regillus.

For the last two years, the affairs in Greece had not been well followed. Philip therefore taking the vantage, that the Ætolians were forfaken of the Romans (the only aid upon which they trufled) forced them both to sue for peace, and to contract the same under what conditions and ca-Ditulations himself pleased: which if he had not made the better hast, all that ever he could to accomplish in good time, P. Sempronius the Vice-Consul, sent to succeed Sulpitius in the govern-R ment, had utterly defeated him whiles he waged war with the Ætolians, confidering that he was ten thousand foot and a thousand horsestrong, and had five and thirty tall ships of war, headed with brasen pikes befores a power of no small importance, I assure you, to aid and assist his allies. For the said peace was not so soon concluded, but news came to the King, that the Romans were arrived at Dyrrhachium; that the Parthines and other neighbour nations, upon hope of change and a new world, began to rife and rebel; and that Dimallum was already befreged and affaulted: for to that City the Romans bent their power (in stead of aiding the Arolians unto whom they were sent) upon high displeasure and indignation, that without their advise and consent, yea, and against the tenor of the accord and covenant they had made a peace with the King, Philip upon these advertisements, for sear lest some farther troubles might arise among the nations and states

C there bordering, took long journeis, & fped him apace toward Apollonia, Thither Sempronius was retired, after he had sent Lettorius his Lieutenant with part of his sorces and thirteen ships into Æsolia, to visit the country, and to see in what terms they stood, yea, and to disturb and break the peace if possibly he could. Philip wasted and spoiled the territories and lands of the Apolloniats, and approching the City with his whole power bad battail to Sempronius the Roman General But after he faw once that he kept himself quiet within the City, standing only upon his guard and defence of the walls; distrusting also his own strength, as not able to force the City by assault: & desirous withal to entertain peace with the Romans as well as with the Ætolians, if he could; if not, yet at least wife to have truce with them: without effecting any more (feeing he could but only rub an old fore, & renew cankred malice upon fresh contention & quarrel) he returned into his realm,

About the seme time, the Epirots weary of long wars, after they had first sounded the disposition and mind of the Romans that way, sent their Embassadors unto Philip, to treat about a general and universal peace: affirming, that they had affored hope of an honorable end and agreement, if his highness would vouchsafe to come to a parly with P. Sempronius the Roman General, And soon they obtained thus much of him, as to pals over into Epirus, for the King himself was not unwilling thereunto. Now there is a City in Epirus, named Phanicethere the King after communication had first with Eropus, Darda, and Philippus, Pretors of the Epirots, entred into an enterview also with P. Sempronius. At this solemn meeting and conference, Aminander the King of the Athamans was prefent, and other Magistrates of the Epirots and Acarmans. And first Philippus the Pretor began to speak and request, as well King Philip as the Roman General, to make an end E of all wars, and likewise to give the Epirots leave to do the same. P. Sempronius propounded and set down the articles and conditions of peace in this wife, That the Parthins, Dimallum, Bargulum and Eugenium, should belong to the Seignory of the Romans, not withstanding that they had obtained of the Senat by their Orators sent to Rome, to be annexed to the dominion of Philip King of Macedony. When they were agreed for peace upon those capitulations, there were comprised within the league on the Kings behalf, Prustas King of Bithynia, the Achaians, the Beeotians, the Theffalians, the Acarnans, and the Epirots: and on the Romans, the Ilienfes, K. Astalus, Pleuratus, Nabis the Tyrant of the Lacedemonians, the Eleans, the Messenians, and the Athenians, And hereof were instruments and Indentures ingrossed and sealed, and truce made for two moneths, until such time as Embassadors were sent to Rome, that the people might by their suffrages approve of the conditions in that form. So all the tribes in general granted the same, because the war now being intended and bent against Africk, they were willing for the present to be discharged of all

P. Sempronius having concluded peace, departed unto Rome for to enter his Confulfhip. Now when as M. Cornelius and P. Sempronius were Confuls (which was the 15 year of the Punick war) the Provinces were affigned unto them in this manner, namely, unto Cornelius, Herruria with the old samy: unto Sampronius the Brutii, with the new legions that he was to enrol. And to the Pretors in this wife were the Provinces allotted that M. Martins should be Lord chief justice of the citizens pleas, and L. Scribonius Libo have the jurisdiction offoreiners, together with the government of Gallia, Itemsthat M. Pomponius Masho should rule Sicily, and T. Claudius Nero sit & as L. Deputy in Sardinia. As for P. Scipio, his commission was renewed and continued for one year longer, with the command of that army and Armado which he had conducted before. Likewife P. Licinius had his commission newly fealed for to have the charge of the Brutians country, with the power of two legions, fo long as the Conful thought it good for the Common-weal, that he should remain in the government of that Province. Also M. Livius & Sp. Lucreius, with the affin flance of those two legions with which they had defended Gallia against Mago, continued fill in their room for another year. Moreover Cn. Offavius remained in place, with commission, that when he had delivered upSardina, & the legion there unto T. Clandins, himself should with 40 long H gallies four the feas, and guard the coafts along the river, within those limits, for which the Senar had given order. Unto M. Pomponius the Pretor in Sicily were appointed the two legions of the Cannian army. And T. Quintius and C. H. Tubulus Vice-pretor, were to govern as they did the former year, the one Tarentum, and the other Capua; and both of them were allowed the old garifons. As for the government of Spain, it was put to question before the people, what two Vicepretors their pleasure was should be sent into that Province. And all the Tribes with one accord gave their grant that the same Pro-confuls L. Cor, Lentulus, and L. Manlins Acidinus, should sit as Governors in those Provinces as the year before. The Contris began now to muster souldiers as well to enrol new legions for to be fent into the Brutians country, as also to supply and fulfil the number of the other armies; according as they were directed by the Senate. And albeit Affrick ! was not yet openly declared a Province, but diffembled by the LL. of the Senate, (of purpose I helieve, that the Carthaginians should have no inkling and intelligence thereof before hand) yet the whole City was in good hope, and made full reckoning that this year the war would be determined and fought out in Africk, and so an end for ever of those troubles. This perswasion of theirs had possessed their hearts with much superstition: and very forward men were, both to report. and also to believe many prodigious and flrange wonders, which daily were blown abroad & divulged more and more: To wit, that there were two funs feen; that in the night feafon between whiles it feemed day light; that in Setia there was a burning torch or blafing Star reaching from the East to the West; that in Tarracina the gate, and in Anagnia, as well the gate as the wall in divers parts were blafted and shaken with lightning; lastly, that in the Temple of Juno Sospita in K Lanuvium, there was a noise and a rumbling heard, with a horrible crack. For the expiation and purging of these prodigies, there was a supplication holden for one day; and a novendral solemn facrifice was also celebrated because it had rained stones out of the sky. Besides all this there was fome confulation about the receiving of dame Idea. For over and besides that M. Valerius one of the Embassadors was returned & had brought word that she would be very shortly in Italy, there came a new messenger with ridings, that she was now already at Taracina. This deliberation (about no small matter, namely, whom they should give judgement to be the best man simply in the whole Ciry) held the Senat much amufed: confidering that every one for his part was more defirous of true victory, and pre-eminence in this behalf, than of any promotions honors or dignities whatfoever awarded unto them by the voices either of Senators or Commoners. In conclusion, I they judged P. Scipio, the fon of that fin, who was killed in Spain, a very young man, and as yet not of full age to be a Questor, the very best man without exception in the whole City. Upon what motives of his fingular vertues they were induced thus to deem of him, as I could willingly have delivered unto posterity, what had been set down in record by the ancient and first writers of those times: lo I will not interpose mine own conceits, in guessing at a thing which hath lien dead and buried so long time. This P. Cornelius was commanded to go accompanied with all the dames of the City as far as to Offia, there to meet the Goddess, and then to take her forth of the ship, and being once fet on land, to deliver her unto the forelaid matrons for to be devontly caried to the City. Now when the ship was arrived at the mouth of the river Tyberis, he, according as he was directed, went aboord in a pinnace, & lanched into the sea: where he took the Goddels at the M Priefts hands, and brought her on shore. And the dames which were the noblest and chief of the City, amongst whom, C. Quintia was the Lady most renowned, received her. This Claudia, who before time(as it is reported) was of no better name & fame than she should be now by this religious and devour ministry, was for her chastity and continency recommended better to posterity. These women carried this Goddess charily & daintily in their hands, and took her by turns, one in course after another. All the City came forth by heaps to meet her: and along the fireets as she was conveighed they flood at the dores with centers, making fweet perfumes, & burning frankincense: yea, & praied unto her, that she would willingly enter the City of Rome, and continue propitions & gracious unto it. Thus they transported her into the Temple of Victoria within mount Palatine, the day before the "Ides of April, which was alwayes after kept as a festival holyday. The N people with great frequency brought gifts unto Palatinm, which they offred unto the goddess & * The Plaies called Migalefolemnized a Lettisternium. And those plaies called Megalesia came up then & were first instituted. Now when the Councel were buly and fat about the supply of those legions which were in the Provinces, there were certain of the Senators began to whifper & blow into their heads. That the "time was now come, no longer to abide those things which during the troubles and dange-" rous daies they made a shift to endure; considering that now at length by the goddess of the "Gods, all fear was past, and the dangers overblown, At which words the Lords of the Senat be-"ing in great expectation and attentive to hear out the rest; they went on and said, That those 12 "colonies of the Latins, which whiles Q. Fabius and Q. Fulvius were Confuls refused to set out "fouldiers, now almost for fix years had intermitted their service in the wars, as exempted from O "warfare altogether, and enjoyed that immunity as an honor and reward for their good deferts: "whereas in the mean time, other loyal and obedient allies, were by mustering every year conti-"nually, wasted and consumed, in performance of their faithful allegeance and dutiful service to "the Empire of Rome. At this speech, the Lords called not so much to mind a thing long sorlet and almost worn out of remembrance as they were provoked to anger and grew very hot, & therefore would not suffer the Consuls to pass any other matter before, but decreed that they should peremptorily

A peremptorily convent to Rome the Magistrats, and ten principal citizens our of every of these Colonies; to wit; Neper, Sutrium, Ardea, Cales, Alba, Carfeoli, Sora, Sueffa, Secial, Circell, Namia, and Interamna, (for these were the Colonies touched in that point above-named) and to lay upon them every one a double levy of footmen, to that number and proportion which they were charged with, when they fer out most in the service of the Roman wars, ever since that the enemies were come into Italy: befides one hundred and twenty horsemen a peece. And in ease any one of those colonies were not able to make up that full number of horsemen, then to allow for every man of arms three footmen; Provided alwayes, that for foot and horse both, such should be chosen and no other, as were most substantial and of the best be haviour, and be sent to what place sover there was need of supply, even out of Italy. And if any of them refused thus to do, then the Con-R fuls had commission to stay the Magistrats and deputies aforesaid, and not to give them audience in the Senat, (although they should require the same) before they had performed those impositions. Moreover those Colonies were enjoyned to pay every year a tax of tribute, and that there should be raised and levied, one Ass in the thousand, of their substance by the month; and be asfessed in those Colonies according to the rate and rule that the Roman Centors should set down; which they gave order to be the same that was laid upon the people of Rome: and the information thereof to be exhibited and presented at Rome by the tworn Centors of the foresaid colonies, before they went out of their office. By vertue of this Act of the Senate, the Magilitaus and chief men of those Colonies were fent for and compelled to repair to Rome: and when the Confuls demanded of them, those fouldiers and tribute aforefaid, they began all of them (but some more than

C others) to refuse and gain say it, yea, and flatly to deny, that so many souldiers could possibly be made, nay, hardly were they able, although they should strain themselves to surnish the bare single number, according to the usual proportion and old prescript order: requesting and befeeching them, to give them leave to have recourse unto the Senat, and there to make sure for their release: neither have we (fay they) so much offended as thus hardly to be used, nor deserved worthily to be undone. And fay, we must needs miscarry and be cast away; yet neither our offence, nor the wrath of the people of Romescan force us to find more fouldiers than we have. But the Coff, resolute in their purpole, commanded the Delegates and Committees of those Colonies, to stay still at Rome, and their Magistrats only to repair home and take musters: for asmuch as (unless the full number of fouldiers which was fet down unto them were brought to Rome) there was no Con-

D ful there would grant them audience in the Senat. Thus when all hope was cut off to have access into the Senat, and to obtain a release; those twelve Colonies took a levy and enrolled the full number. Which was no hard matter to be done, confidering how their youth was increased in that time of long vacation and intermission of warfate. There was likewise another matter (by as long filence forlet and well neer quite forgotten) proposed newly again by M.Valerius Lavinus: who faid, That it was meet and good realon, that those private persons which had credited forth their monies to the Common-weal, when himself and M. Claudius were Consuls, should now at last be satisfied, contented, and paid: neither ought any man to marvail why he (notwithstanding the City were bound for the debt) had a special care and regard to call upon them for to have it discharged: for, besides that the Consul for that year being, when those lones of money n were granted, was in some fort properly obliged to see that credit were kept; himself more over was the very man that made the motion of taking up those monies, in regard that the City chainber was so empty of treasure, and the Commons puries so bare of money, that they were scarce able to pay the ordinary tribut. This overture made by the Conful, was well taken of the Senat, who willed the Confuls to put up this matter to the house: and so they entred an Act and decree, that the faid debts should be discharged at three paiments; whereof the first should be made prefently by the Confuls then in place; the other twain, by the Confuls that were to succeed in the third and fifth years next enfuing.

But there fell out one new object and occurrence, that drowned all other cares befides, and wholly possessed the heads of the Senate, by occasion of the miseries and calamities of the Locri-F ans, whereof before that day, they had no knowledge nor intelligence, and now were by the coming of their Embassadors declared and divulged. Neither were the people provoked to choler and anger, fo much at the lewed behavior and wicked prants of Q. Pleminius, as the flacknes and negligence, or else the partiality and connivency of Soiplo in dealing between them. These Embalfadors of the Locrians, ten in mambet, presented themselves before the Consuls fitting in the open Hall called Comitisms; clad they were in homely weeds and courie apparel, looking pale and poor on the matter; and carrying withal in their hands as tokens of humble suppliants, certain branches of the Olive, according to the manner of the Greeks, fell down profitate upon the ground before the Tribunal, with pitteous weeping and forrowful lamentation. The Confuls demanded who they were: and they made answer again, That they were Locrians, who had endured at the G hands of Q. Pleminius the Lieutenant; and the Roman fouldiers, such indignities; as the people of Rome would not find in their hearts, that the very Carthaginians themselves (hould fuffer and faltain: befeeching them to do them this favour, as to give them leave to have access to the Lords of the Senar, there to make their mone and complain of their worful diffretfes, Being ad-The pitfal mitted into the Senate and audience given them, then the anciented man of the company foake in complaints of this wife, "Right honorable (my LL.) I know full well (quoth he) how importancie would be, the Lorisan and anti-Ll. and available to the due estimate and weight of our complaints and grievance, in case ye were natos 70mm,

* 12 April.

"informed infliciently and knew the truth, as well in what fort Locri was first betraied unto Ang H " nibal as alio after what order the garrison of Annibal was thence expelled, and the City restored again under your obeifance. For if it may appear that the trespais of our revolt, cannot be im-" puted any way unto the publick counsel and content of our City; but contrary-wise, that our re-"turn under your fignory and dominion was not only performed with our good will, but also "first wrought and compassed by the means of our helping hand and valour; ye have the greater "cause to be discontented and displeased with your Lieutenant and souldiers, for offring us (your "good and loyal allies) fuch abuses, so cruel wrongs and unworthy indignities. As for the cause " of our double revolument and change, I think it good to defer the speaking thereof to another "time, and that for two reasons: the one is, that the matter might be heard in the presence of P "Scipio, who recovered Locri, & was an eye-witness of all that we have done, be it good or bad; I "the other is this that how foever we be, yet we should not have abiden those calamities in such " fort as we have supported them. We cannot dissemble (my LL.) nor conceal, how all the while "that we had the Carthaginian garrison within our Castle, we suffered many foul outrages and "Shameful villanies, both at Amilear his hands (the Captain of the garrison) as also from the Nu-" midians and Africans: but what are they in comparison of the abuses & indignities that we en-"dure at this day? May it please you (my LL.) to give us the hearing of those things with pati-"ence, that I shall utter even against my will with grievance. All the world at this day is in su-" fpence-& standeth in great doubt, whether to see you or the Carthaginians, the Soveraign Lords "of the whole earth. But if they were to weigh and counterpoise the Roman and Carthaginian "Empire, by those injuries which have been offred to us of Locri, either from them or your gari- K "fon and which at this day, more than ever before, we ftill endure there is none but would rather es make choice of them to be their foveraign LL, than the Romans, And yet confider, I pray you, " and see how well affected the Locrians are towards you : when we were nothing so hardly used or nor so ill entreated by the Carthaginians, yet we had recourse unto your Captain General: and now that we are missifed of your garison, and put to more forrow than if we were professed enees mies, yet we have run no whither with our complaints but unto your selves. Either shal you my "LL.) vouchsafe to have compassion of our miserable state, or else we see not what we have lest " wherein we should pray unto the immortal Gods, for to be good and propice unto us. Q. Ple-"minius Lieutenant to the General Scipia, was fent with a strong garrison and power of men, to "recover Locri out of the hands of the Carrhaginians; and with the very fame garrifon was he left t "there: but this Lieutenant of yours (for the extremity of miseries and afflictions wherewith we "are driven maketh us bold, and putteth courage in us to speak our minds freely finding nothing "at all in him of a man, my Lords, but the bare shape and outward form; nor of a Roman citizen, " unless it be the habit of apparel which he weareth, and the sound of the Latintongue which he " speaketh. A very plague he is & no better, a monstrous & ugly beast, like unto that, which some-" times (if old tales and fables be true) haunted the narrow leas between us and Sicila. for to de-"ftroy all passengers that sailed by. Who, if he could have been content himself alone to have pra-" Etiled & wrought upon us your allies, all milchievous acts & pranks, of wickednels, of filthy luft, "and greedy coverousness, we would peradventure in all patience & long sufferance, have filled up "that one gulf and pit were it never to deep, & facisfied one gorge never to unfatiable. But now w " to great a delight & pleasure hath he taken that all lewd & licentious parts all shameful acts and " villanies should be commonly practised & in every place committed, that he hath made all your "Centineirs very Pleminis, yea, and your fouldiers as bad as himself. All of them can skill now of "robbing rifling, spoiling, beating, wounding, and killing: they are all good at forcing of dames and "ladies of honor, at ravishing and deflouring of young Virgins, at abusing (against kind) of young-"lings, free born and well descended, whom they pull perforce from between the arms, and out of " the very bosomes of their parents. Daily is our City assaulted and taken; daily is it sacked and " pilled, night and day, there is no place free, but ringeth again with the piteous shrikes and lamen-" table plaints and cries of women and children, harried and carried away in every place, He that "were a stranger to these things, and knew nothing, might wonder well enough, how either we N " can possibly hold out in suffering such outrages, or they which are the doers, not yet be satisfied " and full of committing to great wrongs and injuries. For neither will my tongue and utterance "ferve to deliver, nor needful is it and expedient for you to hear every thing in particular, what " we have sustained. But in general I will comprise and knit up also gether. I will abide by it, that "there is not one house throughout al Locale, I dare avouch there is no person either one or other, "exempt from the wrongs that he hathdone. I fay, & fland to it, that there is no kind of wicked-" nels, no manner of filthy luft & uncleannels, no unfatiable avarice befides, that he hath not affaied to practife upon as many as were capable thereof, & fit fub jects to work upon, Hardly can a man "devise and think, whether of these two mischiess incident to a City be more detestable, either "when the enemies force it by affault in time of war, or when a pefillent & cruel tyrant oppreficth O "it by force & arms during peace, All calamities we endured before, that Towns won and loft are " put unto, And now at this hour, more than ever (my LL.) Pleminius hath perpetrated upon us, " our children & our wives, all those excessive villanies, that the most inhumane cruel & ontrage-" ous syranes can device to exercise upon those subjects, whom they keep down with oppression & "tread under foot. Yet one thing there is (right honorable) whereof both sense of religion imprim-"red & engraffed naturally in our minds conftrains us to make particular complaint by specialty;

The nine and twentieth Book of T. Livius. A "and also our defire is, that ye should have the hearing, yea, and to assoil and discharge your Com-"mon-weal of the scruple of conscience, in case ye think it so meet and requisite. For we have obferved and feen with our eyes, with what devotion and ceremonial reverence, you not only ho-" nor and worthip the Gods of your own, but also receive and entertain those of strangers and "forrainers. We have in our City a Chappel of Proferpinas, Concerning the holiners of which Chouse, I suppose verily, that ye have heard some report and fame, during the war of King Pyr-"rhus: who in his return out of Sieily, passing along the sea side with his sleet by Lecri, among o-"ther shameful villanies and outrages which he committed against our City in despight of us, and "for our fidelity shewed toward you, pilled also and robbed the treasure of this Proserpina, which c to that day, had never been touched by any man whatfoever. And when he had fo done, he em-B "barked the mony, & lent it away by water, but journeted himself by Land. But see what happed "my LL, hereupon! His whole navy the morrow after, was all even toffed, plit, & torn a pieces in "a most hideous gust and horrible tempest, save only those ships wherein that sacred treasure was " bestowed which were cast upon our coast & driven ashore, Whereupon this King, as proud & efferce a Prince as he was, being taught by fo great harms and losses, to believe that there were « Gods in heaven that ruled all; made diligent fearch for all the faid monies, and caused the same " to be brought back again, and laid up in the treasury of Proferpina. And yet for all that, never sped "he well in any thing that he went about, from that day forward, Hunted he was and chased clean out of list, and coming by chance one night, & entering unadvitedly the City of Argos, he died « an obicute, base, and dish onorable death, And not withfianding your Lieutenant, your Colonels C and knight Marshals heard of this and a thousand more such instances & examples which were recounted unto them (not for to amplify and fet out with the highest the great religion and " holiness of the place; but as we and our ancestors have had right evident proof, and that full oftentimes, to shew the manifest power and puissance of that goddels yet were they so hardy as « to lay their theevish and facrilegious hands upon those treasures, that were inviolat and not to " be touched; and fo by that curfed prize and booty have polluted themselves, their houses, and " your fouldiers, Whose service take heed my LL, as ye tender your selves and your credit, how " ye employ either in Italy or in Africk, in any of your affairs and wars there; before ye purge and explar this toul and heinous fact: for fear left they make amends, and pay for this detetlable for-"feit, not only, which their own bloud, but also with some publick loss & calamity of the whole D « State. And even already my LL, the ire and displeasure of the goddes's hath been well seen upon wour Captains and fouldiers both & at this preient day continueth fill, Sundry times they have been together by the earstand foulfied one against another with banners displained. Pleminist the *Captain bare up one fide, and two Marshals or military Etibuns another: Never fought they "more fiercely & sharply with the Carthaginians in the field than amongst themselves in fraies at "the two rd point. And through their furious rage they had given Annibal good opportunity and "vantage to regain Locri into his own hands; but that Sorpe, whom we fent for came in the mean "time upon him. But peradventure (some will say) this madness and fury hanteth and rome neith "the fouldiers only, who, are tainted with the forefaid facriledge, and no power at all of the god-" dels hath been shewed in punishing the leaders and captains themselves. May I wot, in them it E "hath mode evidently appeared. The Tribuns have been bearen with rods by the Lieutenane of the "Lieutenant again, being laid for by the faid Tribuns, and caught in a train, hath not only been" " mangled all his body over, but when they had cut off his note, and cropt his eats, was left for « dead in the place, And afterwards, when the Lieutenant was recovered and cured of his hurrs, he " first imprasoned the Tribunsithen he scourged them & affer he had marryred them, & pur them " to all exquisize tortures that might be devised against bonds laves, he put them to death & When they were dead, would not suffer them to be enterred. Fabius demanded of them, whether they had complained unto P. Scipie, and uttered these their griefs before him, they made anfiver and faid, "That they had fent Embassadors unto him, but he was busied in making prepa-"tion for the wars, and was either passed already over inter Affrick, or upon his voyage ready to "take the Seas within few dayes: and they had feen by good experience in how great favour the ELieutenant Pleminius flood with his general: and namely, they were not ignorant how Scipio after he had heard the matter between the Tribuns and him committed them to prison: but as t "for the Lieutenant, who was as faulty as the other, if not more, him he left there fill in his full "authority. Now after that the Embaffadors were willed to go forth of the Temple where the " Senat fate, the chief LL, of the Senat began with biting words to inveigh bitterly against Scipto ce as well as Pleminius. But above all others, Q. Fabius girded at him, and fad, That he was born even to corrupt and mar all military discipline. Thus (quoth he) in Spain also we have lost more by mutinies of our own fouldiers, than by the wars with our enemies : for why ? after a france and forrainmanner, and according to the guise of Kings, one while he cockered his fouldiers "and suffered them to have their will and head too much; otherwhiles he would be oversharp " and cruel to them. After which rough words, he came upon them both thus with as heavy and "Tharp a fentence, namely, That Pleminius the Lieutenant by his confent should be had away K " bound in chains to Rome, and there clapt up in prison, until his cause were heard, and judicially "determined: and in case those challenges were true, that the Locrians have commensed against "him, he should be put to death in prison, and his goods be confiscate and for feited to the chamto ber of the City, As for P. Scipio, in that he prefumed to depart out of his province without com-" mission and direction from the Senat, he should be called home: and the Tribuns of the Comamons dealt withal, to prefer a bill unto the people for his deprivation, and to put him besides "his place of government. As touching the Locaians, his opinion was, That the Senat should e give them their dispatch, and return them this answer: First, as touching the wrongs that they "Complained of, it was not the will and pleasure neither of the Senar nor of the people of Rome " that they were done; who wished with all their hearts they had been undone : Item, that they I. "acknowledged them to be good men, to be their friends and allies, and so would accept of them "and call them. As to their children, their wives, and other goods taken from them whatforer, "their mind was that they should be restored again: Item, that enquiry should be made what "fums of money were taken out of the treatury of Proferpina, and that two-fold refliction " fhould be made and laid up there in flead of it: I tem, that there should be a solemn pureatory fa-"crifice celebrated for amends and expiation of that fin; but fo, as the colledge first of the Priests "and Bilhops should be consulted with, and their advice taken in that behalf, (confidering the " facred treasure was disquieted, laid open and violated) namely, what manner of expiations and "clentings were to be used, to what Gods, and with what bealts they should sacrifice: Finally, "than all the fouldiers which were at Lors should be transported over into Socie; and in their M " room four cohorts of allies from out of the Latin Nation should be brought to lye in garrison "there. But every Senator could not be asked his opinion and sentence that day, by reason of their difference and disagreement of minds so hotly incensed, some infavour, other in disavour of Scipio. For befides the lewed part of Plemenius, and the calamity & oppression of the Locrians, they began to speak against the apparel of the General himself, "How he went not like a fouldier and " a warrior, no por formuch as like a Roman: walking up and down, and fouring it out in the "fchools and open places of exercise with his mancle and cloke, and in his slippers and pantostes, " after the Greek falhion . And that he was over bookish, and fer his mind too much upon readinguiand took delighe to be in the feating school and wrestling-place and all his men and goard "them at this time in Locri, moreto be feared of their friends than their enemies." And albeit these matters thus reported, were either true, or mingled with some tenths; and therefore someted all years probable; yet the opinion of Q. Metellar prevailed: who in all other things gave his affect unito Maximus, only as couching Step is, he varied from him. " For I can not fee any reason (quoth "he) how this can fload, that whom crewhic the whole City chose at those young years of his, "to be the only Captain for to recover Spain; of whom they made special choice to be their "Conful, after that he had gotten Spain from the enemies, to end at once the Punick war; and "in whom they reposed great hope, that he was the man to draw Annibal out of least, and to O "fubdue all Affriche he now front all of a suddain be called for home out of his Province, "as a perion almost condemned, without pleading and hearing of his cause, as if he were another Plansinius confidering that even those lewed and cruel parts which the Locrians complained "of, were by their own words and confession not committed, whiles he was present in place per "ther could be be charged and accused directly for ought elle but only for his inferance and con-"nivency, in that upon a tender and respective indulgence of his Lieutenaut, he was too tentify

A "and forbare to punish him with rigor. His advice therefore and opinion was, that M. Pomponi-"sthe Pretor, unto whose lot the government of Sielly was fallen, should within three dayer "next and immediatly ebiuing, take his journey into his province; and that the Confuls, should " elect x. Commissioners or Delegates out of the Senate, such as they thought good of, and fend them with the Precor; likewife two Tribuns of the Commons, and one Adile: that the Pretor "with with the affiltance of these personages, should st upon a commission to enquire and know "the truth: and in case they could find that those things wherewith the Locrians sound them-" felves fo much grieved, were done either by commandment and direction from Seipio, or with this will and confent; then to charge him to depart out of the province. But in case that P.Sci-" pio were already passed over into Affrick; then the foreignd Tribuns of the Commons, and the B "Ædile, joyning unto them two of the Delegates abovefaid, (fuch as the Pretor deemed moft meet) should fail into Affrick; and the Tribuns and Ædile bring with them Scipio from thence: " and the two Commissioners have the charge and government of the army, until such time as a " new L.General succeeded and came in place. But it M. Pomponius and the ten Delegates above-"faid, found that neither by the direction, nor with the will of P. Sorpio these enormities were committed, then P. Seipio should remain still with the army, and go forward with the war as he intended. When this decree of the Senar was once passed, and an act made thereof they were in hand with the Tribuns either to agree between themselves, or else to cast lots, which two of them should go with the Pretor and the Delegates. And then the colledge of the Bishops were confulted with about the expiation and making fatisfaction for those things which in the Temple C of Proferpina at Locri were either handled polluted, or carried forth from thence. The Tribuns of the commons that went the journey with the Pretor and the Commissioners, were M.Claudius Marcellus & M. Cincius Alimentius: who also had an Ædile of the Commons to assist them whom they might command, if Scipio would not obey the Pretor, whether he were in Sicily, or gone over into Affrick, to apprehend and attach his body; and by vertue of their facrofanct and inviolable authority to bring him home with them. And first they resolved to go to Lacri before they went to Messina, But concerning Pleminius, the report goeth two wayes, Some say, that when he was advertised what was intended and devised against him at Rome, he purposed to go to Naples into banishment, and chanced by the way to light upon one of the Delegates above faid, and so by him was perforce brought back to Rhegiam. Others affirm, that Scipio himself sent out one of his D. Lieutenants, accompanied, with 30 of the most noble Knights or Gentlementhat he had about him, with a warrant to commit Q. Flemilius, and with him the principal Authors of the fedition, and to lay them faft in irons, But certain it is that the yell, were it by the commandment of Scipio. before, of themby warrant from the Presor, were put isward and fafe-cuftody with the Rhegins. The Pretogrand she Delegars being come to Lorr, first and sermost, according to their commissions on, had a principal care of Religion. For all the holy money which they found by diligent fearch in the custody either of Pleminius, or of the fouldiers together with that which they themselves had brought with them from Rome, they belfowed again intite privy vehicles where the reasure waskept: and besides, they made a solemn purgatory acadites for the Sacrifedge. After this, the Pretor affembled, the fouldiers together, and commanded them to carry their Enfigns out of the City: where pinnielf encamped upon the plains and proclaimed that no souldier, as he would anfwer at his untermost peril, should either tarry behind, or bring forth any thing with him but his own. Then he save the Locrians leave, that every man thould lay hold upon that which he knew to be his owns and if ought were not forth-coming and to be feen, to challenge and put in his claim for it. iil ad aboue all things, his pleafurewas, that all bodies of free perions what foever, hould mithour deby be restored unto them, and if any made default of reflication, he should abide the magnetic be gris woully punished. Then he affembled the Locriess to an audience, and pronounced before them all, That the people and Senat of Rosse granted unto them their ancient liberty, and kheirown land: giving netice anto them, that who foever had any thing to say against Pleminimica any meter perion by way of acculation, he should follow him to Rhegium, and there Fgive attendance; Alfo if they were defirous to make a public a sud-open complaint of Scipie, mamely, That the facts committed at Lori molt impionly and watterly, while both God & many palled eithogunder his warrant, or with histease and liting being they frontifficad Embefiadors to Meffanginehere he together with his Councel and affittants would give them andience of al matters, and the temperature of the control and anatomist which is the property of the matters, and the temperature accordingly. also in person to Scipie, to be eye-witnesses and to make report at Rome of their own knowledge, H as couching the magner of appared, the idle life of the General, and the loofe, diffoline, and corrope military discipline of his fouldiers ; to rife and common in many mens months, Against their coming to Syracule, Scipia was provided of deeds to approve his innocency, and not of words to excule his folly. Elagave order for all his forces there to meet, and for his armado to be in readipels, anif be were that day to give barrail both by Land and Sea to the Carthaginians. The very same day that they arrived thither, they were friendly received and courteoully entertained by Scinio, The morrow after he thewed them all his forces, as well for Land as Sea fervice, not only furnified, well appointed, and in readines; but the one fort, namely the land fouldiers, running and charging one another at turney; and the Sea servitors likewise within the haven, representing a naval combat with their thips. Then he led the Pretor and the other commissioners all about, to see I the arienal and armory, the store-houses, the garners of corn, and all other provision and surniture for the war. At the view and fight whereof, they were firthen with fuch exceeding admiration. both of every thing in particular, and of all in general, that they were fully periwaded that either by the conduct of that Captain and valour of that army, the Carthaginians might be overcome and conquered, or by none other in the world: yea, and they willed him in the name of God. without more ado to pass over into Affrick, and with all speed possible to make the people of Rame to enjoy the effect of that hope which they conceived that very day, on which all the Centuries nominated and declared him with one voice the former Conful of the twain: and with fo joyous hearts they took their leave and departed from thence, as if they were to bring tidines to Rome of a glorious victory; and not to make relation and report of a magnifical and stately prepa- K ration, for war. Plemining and all they that were likewise attaint and guilty, after they cameto Rome, were immediately clapt up and laid fast in prison. At the first time when they were brought out before the people by the Tribuns, they could find no grace, no favour nor mercy amonest them, their minds were to forstalled and polletted aforehand, with the confideration of the woful miferies and calamities of the poor Locrians. But afterwards, being produced oftner unto them, as the harred conceived against him, began to wear and decay, so mens anger grew to asswage and foscen : besides the pitions plight and deformed hew of Bleminius there present, and the remembrance withal, of Scipie now ablest, gat him some favour with the people. Yet he died in prilon, before his capie was indicially tried, and definitive sentence of him passed. Clodius Licinius reportesh in this third baok of the Rossan flories, that this Mininius in the time of the games which I Affricanus (accord time Conjul, exhibited at Reme, according to a vow by him made, went about (by the help of fome whem he had continued and waged for money) no fer the City on fire is divers places thereby to have apportunity on breakprison and make an escape: but when his wicked purpole was once diclosed and brought to light, he was condemned and awarded by anact of Senat to the dungeon Tulliaumn: But as for Scipe; there were no words made of him; neither come he in queltion any where also been in the Senat: where all with one accord both committoners and Triburs by excolling and magnifying with plottons words, the navy, the army and the Captain, brought it to about, that the sense thought good and were agreed, that with all convenight speed Scipie thould over into Affrick; and have liberty granted out of those asmies which were in Sicila, 19 make choice of those whom he would himself tramport over with him into M Africh, and whom he would leave behind for the guard and defence of the Province.

Whiles their things patied thus smacongit the Romans: the Carthaginians also having frem all the winter time in much impiction and continual fear, hearthning to all news, and enquiring fearfully of every medianges, and keeping watch upon all their promontones and high hills by the Sea inde hefured themselves like wife, and procured the fociety and alliance of K. promiles. For himself was not only linked in matrimony with a Citizen of Carthage, the daugher of that Afdrabal whom he saw entertained as a guest in his court, but also joyned in a publick "league with the people of Carthage, And first he exhorted him that the Romans would war "with the Carthaginians far from Africk, as hitherto they had done; for fear left he should of " necessity be forced to have an hand, and intermeddle in their quarels; and so while he defired to avoid the danger and holtility of one part or other, be driven at length to fide all one way e givwing him more plainly to understand, that if Scipio would not forbear Africk, but needs come with an army against Carthage, then must be necessarily fight in defence of the land of Africk, wherein himself wasborn, and for the native country, for the father and house of his own wife. With this R commission and direction were certain Orators sent unto Seinio, who met with him at Syracuse, and there delivered their metsage. Scipio, albeit he was difappointed greatly of his ground-work that he had laid for his wars in Africk, and put besides his good hopes; gave the Embassadours letters into Africk unto the King, and lent them back again in all haft, before the thing were published and come abroad. In which letters he requested him earnestly to be advised and bethink himtelf that he brake not the rights either of friendship & hospitality begun with him, or of the league and fociety entred with the people of Rome : nor violated juffice and faithfull promise made by giving right handsmor yet beguile and abuse the gods, the witnesses and judges of all covenants and agreements made. But for a funch as the coming of those Numidians could not be concealed (for they went all about the City, and were daily converiant in the Generall his lodging : and if it C should have been kept secret wherabout they came, it was to be doubted lest the truth the more it was imothered and diffembled, the more it would breake forth and come to light; and fo the army was to stand in fear, that they were to war at once both with the king and Carthaginians. Scipio therefore buzzed aforehand into mens beads, false devised matters, and so withdrew them from the understanding of the truth indeed. He assembled all his souldiers together, and said unto them a "that now it was no longer staying and trifling out thetime : bearing them in hand, that the "Kings, his allies and conferats, importuned him to let over into Africk with all convenient speed; that Malanilla beforetime himself in perion came to Lalins, grieving and complaining that the "time ran thus on in delaits and doing nothing: & Syphiax now fent his Embassadors, musing much "and wondring what the cause should be of so long temporising : and requiring that either the ar-D" my without more ado, thould be fent over at once: or elle if their minds and purposes were chan-"ged, to certifie him fo much, that he likewife might provide for himself and his kingdome. And therefore be did them to wit and thideritand, that he meended now that he was fulficiently pro-" vided and furnished of all things; and considering that the imprese might abide no farther stay.) "to conduct his armado to Lisybann, to wait the first good day of wind and weather, to take the "leas for a bon-voiage, and with Gods grace and favour to fet fail for Africk. His letters be difprehed to Marens Pempenius to this effect, that if he thought so good, he should repair to Lilybesierto the end they might commune and confult togetiffer, what legions especially, and what number of fouldiers he should transport over with him into Africk. Inlike manner, he fent al about the maritime and fee coalts, to ftay aff the carricks and ships of burden, and to bring them a-E way at once to Lilybaum. Now when all the thips and ferviceable men in Sicily were affembled to Lilybann, fo as neither the City was able to receive the multitude of fouldiers, northe haven contein the number of the veffels; to earneftly minded they were all, and to hotly fet upon their voiageinto Africk, that they seemed as if they were conducted not to fight a war, but to enjoy the affured sewards of a victory. But especially above all others, the souldiers remaining of the Cannian army; were verily perfusaded, that under this captain, or elie none, by valiabily quitting themelves in the feevice of the Common-weal, they should be able to end and finish their ignominous and thanefull totaldiery. And Sciple himfelfmade no base account of those kind of fouldiers, as knowingfull well that the defeat received at Canna; was not occasioned by their cowardife; neither water there throughout the Roman army any fouldiers to ancient and of to long conit timande, it to well experienced not only in many and fundry foughten fields, but also in the affaulting of towns and Cities: And thele Legions of Canne were the fift and fixt in order. Now when he had ome reloved and given out, that he would transport them over with him into Africk, then he took a particular view of them, man by man. And having culled out those, and left them behind, whom he supposed unmeet and unfassicient, he subtitured in their place those whom he had srought with him out of Italy a and to fally he tapplied and made up his number of those Legions, that either of them mad fix thouland and two hundred foot, and three hundred men of simes the choic alto out of the same army of Canas, both horsemen and footmen, of the silies and confederats of the Latine nation. What power of fouldlers in the whole were let over into of why writers differ not a little in the number. In some authors I find, that they G meneten thousand foot; and two thousand and two hundred horse . in others, fifteen thousand fortinen, and lifecen madeed horiement to in some records again, they were more by one balic and smeety namely 2 this of Book and foot there were embasked five and thirty thouland. And others these be that have fee down no number at all, amongs whom, as in a matter to doubtfull and historius. It would my fall be counted for one. But Cation for his part, as he forbeareth to put do winney manter as allow he feetied for to imply att infinite multitude of them, in that he faith this with weep and the distribute the fooldiers for up, the very fouls of the air fell down to the ground:

and he that had feen the multitude of them when they went a fhipboard, would have faid there a had not been a man left behindeither in Italy or in Sicily. Well how many or how few foever they were, Scipio himfelf took the charge to fee the fouldiers embarked in good order, and without any tumnit. As for the failers and mariners, who were forced before to shipboord, C. Lalim the Admirall of the navy, kept them still and quiet within their ships. M. Pomponise the Pretor had commission for to surnish the armsdo with corn and victuals; who made provision of food and suftenance for 45 daies : of which there was of baked meats and other viands already dreffed, as much as would suffice for 15 daies. Now when they were all embarked, he sent about to all the ships certain pinnaces or cock-boats, and commanded all the pilots and malters of every thip, with two fouldiers apeece, to come into market place, there to receive their charge. When they were all met and affembled together, first he enquired of them whether they had provided and taken into I their vessels fresh water sufficient both for man and beast, to hold out so many daies as their corn would ferve? and when answer was made that they had water in their ships to last five and forty daies; then he charged and commanded the fouldiers to keep filence and be quiet during their navigation, and without any strife and contention to be obedient unto the mariners, and wiling to help in any ministery and service whatsover, saying, that himself and L. Scipio would keep on the right wing with twenty flrong ships with brasen beak heads, and C. Laline the Admiral with M. Porcion the Treasurer on the left, with as many of the same fort, to wast over and puzzl the hulks and thips of burden: willing and requiring that there should be light in all their vessels. namely, that every braien headed fhip should have one; each Carrick twain; and the Admirall thip, wherein the Generall was, three lights, for a special mark, to be discerned from the rest in K the night. And so he commanded the Pilots to steer and direct their course for Emporia. The territory hereabout is most fertile and fruitfull, whereby the whole country aboundeth in plenty of all things: the barbarous pealants (as commonly it falleth out in battell and plentifull lands) are cowards, and unapt for war, and it was thought they might be surprised and subdued before any fuccour could come from Carthage. When their directions were given, they were commanded to retire to their ships, and the next morrow at the signall, with the help of the gods to weigh anchor, house up fails and away. Many Roman Armadoes had aforetime set out of Sicily, and the very same port : but never any voiage all the time of that war, no, nor during the former, made to goodly a fliew, and was to much looked on. And no marvell for most of their other fleets were fent our only to rob and to fetch in pooties and prizes. And yet if a man would efteem na. L vies by the number and greatnesse of thips, there had been aforetime two Consuls together, who went over with a power of two complete armies: & in every of those fleets, therewere welneer as many war flips with braten beak heads, as halks & carricks in those that Scipio transported over-For belides fifty long thips of war, hehad not all out four hundred thips of burden and passage to transport over his army with. But if we would compare both wars together, the second feemed unto the Romans more tharp and cruekehen the former hoth because it was fought within Italy, and also by reason of so great overturows of so many armies, together with the loste and death of their Generall captains. Moreover great expectation there was of Scipie the Commander and Generall of this voiage, a man much renowned and talked of, both in regard of his own noble acts of cavalry, and also of a speciall and singular fortune that followed him in all his exploits ; where: M by he grew every day more glorious then other: which cauled all mens hearts to be fetupon hims befide his very resolution and mind that he carried, to pass in Africk, which all the while of that war entred not into the head of any Captaine before, him: in that he gave it out abroad. That he meant to go over, with intent to draw and fetch Annibal out of Italy, and to divert and tranflate the war into Africk, and there to finish and make an end of it. There came runping unto the haven to fee the fetting out of his Armado, the whole multitude, not only of the jobsbitants of Lilybains, but also the train of all the Embassages opt of Sivily, which were come together, for to accompany Scipie, and to do him honour, and also attended upon the Pascorof the province M. Pemponism. Over and befides , those legions also which were left behind in Sicily, went forward to bear their fellow fouldiers company. So that not only the navy N WAS a goodly prospect unto the beholders upon the land, but also the strand in overspread all about with numbers of people, made a brave and pleasant flight unto these passengers, that were in the thips. When day light once appeared, Scipie from out of the Admirall after filence commanded by voice of the crier) praied in this wife" O ye gods and goddefses all, that haunt and inhabit The praier "feas, and lands both, I beleech and pray you to vouchiafe, that all that, ever bath been done alway "dy, is now intended, or shall hereafter be enterprised, during my conduct and government, "may speed well, and turn to the good, of my felf, the people and commonalty of Remajors "allies, and especially those of the Latine nation; who by land, by seas by rivers; followate di-, rection, command, government, and fortune of my felf, and of the people of Rome; and that sein all our actions ye would be good, gracious, favontable, and pelofull noto mis and advance O all our proceedings; that ye would grant us the victory over our spenies ; and after we have " tubdued them, to continue fate and found; and adorned with their goodly foolistaden with their "rich pillage, to return home all together with glorious triu uph : & give us the band and oppor-"tunity to be revenged of our foes and mortall enemies a and deign me and the people of Reme " that power and itrength, to execute upon the City of the Carringings thele feaful execute " ples of cruelty, which the people of Carrbage intended to practical and bring upon her City

A wand flate. After these prayers thus pronounced, he took the raw inwards and purterance of the healt killed for facrifice (as the maner is) and flung them into the fear and with that by found of trumpet, gave the fignall of departure.

Now were they under sail: baving a good great gale of a forewind, they foun loft the fight of land. In the afternoon, there began to fall a thick milt; by tealen whereof the thips could hardly syoid running one upon another. But when they were once in the main and deep fea, the wind became more mild and all the night following, the same dark milt continued fall. After the fun was once up it brake and dispersed, and then the windagain grew big and high, by which time they might discover land. And not long after, the pilot faid noto Scipie, that they were not full too leagues from Africk; and that he faw well and differned the cape or point of Mercarius: B and if his will and pleature were thither to direct their course, presently the whole armado should be in the rode, Scipio to toon as he was within view of land, after, be had made his prayers unto the gods, tobleffe this first discovery of Africk to his own good and the benefit of the common-weal; gave commandment to fail fall, and to put with the shore and ride at anchor in some bay beneath. So they made way with the fame wind. But about that very time as the day before, they were milted again, and loft the fight of land, And as the fog increased, the wind tell the night alfo that came upon them belides, made all things more doubtfull. Whereupon they caft anchor for fear that the ships should be one against another, or run aground. When day light arose, the same wind was up again, but the foggy milt icattred; and then they might fee plainly all the coast of Afreik. Scipio then demanded what promontory it was that he faw next; and hearing that the name of it C was The head Pulchrum, or The fair Cape the name (quoth be) pleafeth me, and the prefage thereof Hike full well ; even this her put the things aland, and fo the armado curred the bay, and all the hoft was fet ashore. Thus have I reported that they had a prosperous voyage without any fearfull danger, or much trouble; giving credit hereinto very manny writers, as well Greeks as Latines. Only Calina (letting afide that the thips were not caft away and drowned amid the furging waves) writeth how other dangers both of water and weather encountred them; in fo much as at the last the Atmado was driven by tempest from the coasts of Africk, and fell upon the Iland * Egimurus, from whence they had much ado to recover their direct course again; and finally when the ships were at hand to fink under the water, then the souldiers faring like men at point to fuffer ship wrack, without lience and commandment of their Generall and without their armor! D in great fear made shift with boats to recover the shore.

The Romans thus being landed, pitched their tents among the bils next adjoyning. By which time the terror and fearfull fright of this their arrivall was not entred only into the Maritime coales and territories bounding upon the fea, first upon the discovery of the fleet, and afterwards by reafon of the rumor and tumult of the army, as it came afhore; but also spred forward as far as to the good towns and very Cities. For not only the high waies were all filled and overspred with multitudes of men, women and children, who went by heapstogether one with another; but also the country peafants drave before them whole herds of catteless a man would have faid that had feen it, how all Africk was like to be abandoned at once on a fuddain : in such fort, as they put the Cities indeed in greater fear & perplexity then they were themselves, and ofpecially Carthage above E all others : where there was no leffe trouble and hurliburly, then if it had been jurgified and forced by the enemie. For fince that time that M. Attilina Regular, and L. Manline were Coff. for the space almost of fifty yeers, they had not once so much as seen an army of Romans, but only certain fleets of rovers and men of war, who had landed at times, and made some rodes into the lands lying upon the fea fide : and when they had harried fome prizes, fuch as came next hand, they ever were retired again to the ships, before the alarme could be given to raise the country. The greater therefore now was both the flight and fright within the City. And to speak a truth, good canfe they had; by reason that there was neither at home in readiness an army of pullsance to encounter the enemy, nor acaptain of valour to conduct and lead an army. Afdrabal was the fon of Gifga, for nobility and high parentage, for honour and renown, for wealth and riches, and be-F fides for the new affinity then contracted with King, was of all others the personage by many degrees, yea, and the only man of the whole State. And him they remembred very well to have been foiled, discomfitted and besten out of the field in Spain, by the felf-fame Scipto in divers and fandry battels. Also they made accompt, they were no more able to match the Captains man for man, than to compare and fet their tumultuary power railed in halt, with the staid and experienced army of the Romans. Therefore they gave the alarm prefently, as if Bripis were ready to affank Corchese out of hand a the gates with all freed were that and made fare : the wals manned with fondiers : the corps de guard fet awatch and ward kept : and all the night following the Sentinels duly relieved and mainteined. The next day, 500 light horse were sent out as cipials and vancurriers to discover and four the quincers to the featide; and withall to impeach them G that were a differring and couring, land r who chanced to light on the Romans corps de guard. For Sepie had fent away the fleet already to Fries, and before he was gone up into the land far from the iea, had encamped upon the next hils thereby, placed guards of horiemen in convenient places, and put our certain foregers into the fields and villages for to raile booties. Thele having enered shimish with the Carthaginian comet and horiemen, flew a few of them in the very confict, be most of them as they fied and were followed in chair, amongst whom was Hanno alto the provolt markedle, a noble young gentleman. Scipio not only waited the country all about, but alto wan's City of the Affricans that Itood neerelt, and was of inflicient wealth : where befides u other billage which was prefently imbarked in the thips of burden and fent into Sicily, there were taken priloners eight thousand polles of free and bond one with another. But the greatest joy and contentment that the Romans took in this new entrance and beginning of their warlike affilts, was for the coming of Majanifa; whom fome report to have pretented himfelf with 200 horse and no more : but the most do write that he came with 2000. But for as much as this Man fatiffa was of all other Kings for histime the greatest Prince and most pulsant, and withall he that flood the Romans in belt flead and helped their flate, none like unto him : me thinks it were worth their labor, and would quit for all the paines, to digreffe a little out of the way, for to fhew and declare in what variety of alternative fortune he was toffed, both in the loffe and also in the recovery of the inheritance of his fathers kingdome.

This Malanifa, whiles he was employed during the wars of Spain, in the defence and onarrell of the Carthaginians; his father, whole name was Gala, hapned to die : and then the kingdome fell by descent, according to the custome and manner of the Numidians unto Desaless the late Kings brother, a man of great years and very aged. And not long after, when Defalces also was departed his life, Capula the elder of his two fons, (for the other was a very child) succeeded in his fathers Kingdome. But for as much as he the foresaid Capusa maintained his royall state and throne, more by reason of the authority and reputation that he carried among his friends and favorits, than by power and frength; there atole up in arms one named Mezetalu (who also was defeended of royall bloud, but of an house that was ever of the adverse and contrarie fide) K and contended in much variety offortune about the crown, with those who then swayed the fcester. This Mezerales having gathered a power of his tenants, followers, and pealants of the country (with whom he carried a great stroke and was highly esteemed, by reason of the hatred that they bare unto the Kings race) encamped openly and shewed himself in action, yea, and forced the King to come into the field, and to trie the title of the crown in a fet battell by dint of fword. In which conflict, Capufa, together with many of his peers and nobles werellain, and the whole nation and feignory of the Maililians, was reduced under the rule and obedience of Mezetalin Howbeit he forbare tobe called King; and contenting himself with the mean name of Tutor or Protector, gave the Kings stile to the child Lacamax, who only remained alive of the Kings fine and line. He took to wife a noble dame and lady of Carthage, Annibal his neceeby his filter who had been lately wedded unto King Defalces; hoping thereby to enter into league L and alliance with the Carthaginians and belides, for to renew the ancient familiarity and amity with Syphan, he tent Embaffadors unto him of purpole. Thus made he himfelf ftrong aforehand against Majanista. Mafaniffa hkewife for his part, being advertised of his uncles death, and also how his confin german was deceated, croffed the less out of Spain over to Mauritania, at what time as Boochar was King of the Moors. At whole hands by humble fute and importunat praiers in molt lowly manner, he obteined a power of 4000 Moores to accompany him in the journey, for otherwise to employ them in war he might not. And after he had dispatched a messenger afore-hand to those that were his fathers friends and wel-willers to himfelf, by that time that he was come with them to the confines of his realm, there met him almost 500 Numidans, Having therefore fent back sesin M the Moores from thence unto the King, according to covenant, albeit there was affembled together a smaller number of people then he hoped and looked for, and not to sufficient that he dust adventure upon to great an enterprife; and supposing withall, that by entring into some action, and by travell and endeavour, he should gather strength still to perform some great exploit, he encountred at Thapfus the yong king Lacuman, as he journied unto Syphan. And when the Kings company in great fear fled into the town, Mafaniffa both at the first assault won the said town, and also of the Kings train received some that yeelded themselves, and slew othersome that made refstance in their own desence. But the greatest part with the child himself the young Prince, got away in that tumult and elcaped unto Syphan, unto whom at first they intended their journes The fame of this small thing, so happily atchieved in the first beginning and entrance of his affairs, N canfed all the Numidians to revolt and fide with Mafaniffa. So as there flocked unto him from all parts of the country, and out of the villages, the old fouldiers of King Gala, and incited the yong Prince and fet him on to recover his fathers kingdome. Now in number of fouldiers, Mezatalia was a good deal superior : for both himself and the same army still entire, with which he had vanquished Capasa, besides had some others that after the slaughter of the King, he had received upon their yeelding and also young Lacuman the infant, had brought great aids from Syphan: 10 that Mezetulus was fifteen thouland foot, and tenchouland horse strong. With whom Majanifa. albeit he were nothing to putfiant either in foot or horfe, fought a battell; yet atchieved he the victory through the approved valour of the old louidiers, and his own politick wifedome, being a captain well experienced and exercised both in the Roman and Punick wars. The young O Prince together with his tutour and protectour, and some small number of Massilians, fled and escaped into the territories of the Carthaginians. Thus Mafaniffa having recovered his fathers Kingdome, and foreseeing that there remained still behind a far greater bickerment and encounter with Syphax, & taking it to be the best course and policy for him, to be reconciled and made friends with his cousin german : addressed certain messengers both unto the child, for to put him in good hope and affurance, that if he would submit and yeeld himselfe under the protection

With whom in that tunnic he let flip as it were east of his hands . Majawijia also samulf fore a wonned and lost him clean. As he fled, he had faith his cir certain corners of horizon diperied all over the plain, and some of them crofling the waiss overthwest to meet the enemy at every turn, and to intercept him. But he and the four housmen with him fled forwards ftill, and took the great river before them : for their fear and fright was greater then to make any fray at the bank fide, but to put their hories to it, and plunge in where they were carried with the current of the fiream and born to a fide, two of them in the fight of the enemies were swallowed up of the deep hitlinits; himlelfallo was supposed to have perilled with them, but he and the other two borimen beindes caught hold of certain twigs, of olivers that grew under the hanks on the farther fide, so Becker, made an end of farther purisie, as neither daring to take the river, nor beleeving that he had any enemy for to chair. And thus returned he to the King with falle news, that Majanifla ? was drowned. And divers polts and curriers were fent out to Carthage, to report their exceeding joyfull tidings. This rumour and same of Masan fa his death being noised all over Afriche wrought diverily in the minds of men. But Majariffa keeping himfelt close in a ferret cave. whiles he cured his burt with certain berbes, lived for some dates by the foraging and robbery of the other two horfmen. So foon as the wound was once healed up and skinned over, and that he thought himself able to shide the fitting and shaking of his horse, with exceeding courses & boldneffe he fet forward again to claim and recover his kingdome. And baving in the way as he naffed goften together unto him not above forty horfe, by that time he was come among the Maffilians, and gave out openly who he was, he prevailed to much with them, that as well in regard of their ancient favour and love toward him, as also for the unexpedied joy that they saw him alive and K found, whom they verily believed to have been dead; within few daies there were gathered and assembled unto him 6000 foot, and 4000 horse. So as not only he was restored again, and put in full possession of his fathers Kingdome, but also wasted and spoiled the confederat nations of the Carthaginians, yea, and the frontiers and confines of the Mafztyli, which belongeth to the Kingdome and dominion of Syphan. Having thus provoked Syphan to wan he fet him down and encamped between the Cities of Circha and Hippo upon the ridge of certainhile places of advantage and commodious in all respects. Then Syphan supposing it a greater peece of work, and of more importance then to be managed by his captains, fent part of his forces under the conduct of his for the young Prince named Vermine, and gave order mate him to wheel about with his power, and whiles the enemy was amuled upon bimielt one way, to charge upon him behind another I way. So Vermina let forth, and took his way by night, because he was to give the sharge delety, and infeciet. But Spher, who was to thew himfelt with banner displaced, and to bid the treme barrell, marched oppoly by day light, and advanced forward. And when she sime (as he shough) was comes, wherein they that were lens about to tested a compact, might reach to depice appointed, himself also traiting as well in the multiwide othis men, as in the smbuch light before at the enemies back, let his battell in arrays, directly upon the fide of the hill, which with gentle and eaffe afcent arileth, and leadeth towards the enemy. Mafanifalikewile arranged his area, prefunting most of all in the plot of ground, which ferved much better for his advantage to fints. The butteff was there and eruell, and for a long time doubtfull. Whiles the face of the place, and valout of the fouldiers much helped Majaniffa, and the number again on the other fide; which M exceeded beyond all measure, and made too great odds, availed Sysbax. This multitude divided into two battaillons, whiles the one was opposed affront the enemy, and the other compaised sbout their tail and back part, gave the victory clearunto Syphan : informach, as the enemy thus encloted both before and behind, had no way in the world to cleape. Whereupon all the footmen and notimen buth were either killed or taken priloners. Claudius to fell and make away his great horse likewise; and that for two causes, the one for that he had born fall witnefs and depoted wrongfully against him; the other, because he was not foundly and in truth of heart reconciled unto him, when they were made friends. Whereupon there grew a foul jar and contention between them, whiles they pasted not to impeach and stein the credit one of the other even with the touch and h zard of their own good name and reputation. At the end of the Cenforfing, when C. Claudius had (worn to keep and observe the lawes, and was alcended up into the chamber of the Cities treasure, among the other names of those that he left as disfranchised and E tributaries, he declared his collegue for one, and gave up his name in the roll. Afterwards came

M. Livin; into the chamber aforefaid, and letting afide the tribe Metia only (which neither had condemned himfelf, nor elected him a condemned person for Consul or Censor) he declared the whole people of Rome like wife suspended, even four and thirty tribes; and left them all no better then meer strangers and aliens, in regard of taxes and tributes . and why? because they had both condemned him, an innocent and guilt'e is man: and being thus condemned, had created him Coff. and Cenfor notwithstanding: neither could they deny but that they had cred and done amisse in their judgement, and twice in their elections. And among those four and thirty tribes, he pronounced that C. Claudius also should be reckoned for one; protesting moreover, that if he could have found any one precedent, to have led him to the disfranchiling one man twice, he would F have left C. Clanding by name, as a noted person by himself, in the checkroll of the City cham-

Surely that reciprocall debate between the two Cenfors, in depraving and defaming one another was but a lewd and naughty part by them plaid: but this chalifement of the peoples levity and inconflancy, was a worthy thing, and beferming the Cenfors gravity of that time. While the Cenfors frood thus in exceeding difgrace and hatred with the people, Co., Bebisse a Tribune of the Commons taking his time and occasion hereby to rife and become great, endited them both and commenced an action against them before the body of the people. But this deligoment of his was Condaint and came to mothing, though the generall accord and content of the LL. of the councell, to the end th. tin time to come, no fuch example might be extent upon record, that the Cenfors C dignity (hould be exposed to the variable and inconstant pleasure of the people.

The lame fummer in the Brutians country, Petilia had been already forced and won by the Cof. when as Comfania and Pandofia, with other mean and base peeces, willingly yeelded themselves to his devotion. Now when the time drew neer of the election of new magiltrats, it was thought good that Cornelius should be sent for to Rome out of Tuscany, where there was no war at all, rather then the other Conful out of his province: who being come, created for Confuls Come Serviline Capio, and Cm. Servilius Geminus. After this, the court was affembled for the chifing of Presours, wherin were elected P. Cornelius Lanulus, P. Quinsilius Farus, P. Allius Ferus, and F. Fallius I applus. These two last were Ædiles of the Commons when they were chosen Pretora The Committed and its are these elections were similar and past, returned anto his amy again in Hennia. Cermin Princis and Freists that year died, and new were chosen in their rooms. P. Veswins Phila, Flamin of Mens was created, installed and inaugurated, instead of M. Amylius Regillus, who decessed the year before, And in place of M. Pompasius Masho, who was both Augur and Decemvis-there was advanced into dignity of Decemvis; M. Anvilus Casta: and into the effice of Augur, Tis. Semprasius Grackus, a very yong man: a rare thing to be seen in those dairs, in the bestiowing of facerdotal and church promotions. In that year was set up in the capitols a charies drawn with a facedosal of beaten goldyby ("Livius and M. Servilus Geminus, Adiles of the chair for the time being. The Romā games also were exhibited & renewed again for a daires like wise the plates & pastimes called Plobeii, for other 2 dairs by the Adiles of the Commons, A. Elius & P. Vilius, I And for the great honce of those games, the feat of Japiter was solemnly kept and celebrated.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the thirtieth Book.

W Africk. Scipio by the help of Malanifla in fundry battels vanquished the Carthaginians.together with the afore-faid Syphax King of the Numidians, and Aldrubal. He won and facked two campsof the enemies, wherein there perished by fire and sword, to the number of 40000 men. By the means of C. Luliushe took Syphax alive. Mataniffa when he had taken prifoner queen Sophonista, the wife of Syphax and daughter of Aldrubal, by and by fell in love with her, and by way of marriage took her to wife : but being chastifed and rebuked therefore by Scipio, he feut unto her a cup ofpoism: which fhe drank & therof died. By manifold victories of Scipio it came topass, that the Carthaginians driven to despair, were fain to call for Annibal one of Italy, to fave the main chance, and defend their L whole flate: Who, in the 16 year of the wars, departed out of Italy, failed over into Altick, of affaied by means of enoference, to make peace with Scipio. And when they could not agree about the conditions & capulations thereof he fought of was overthrown in the plain field. The Carthaginians at their fait Grequest bad peace granted. And when Gifgo diffwaded that peace, Annibal pluced himback with his hand, of o after some excuse made of his ruderasmess in that behalf, himself spake for peace. Mago who had fought with the Romans in the country of the Infubrians, was grievoufly wounded, & being fent for home into Africk by certain embasadors, in the way died of his hurt, Malanilla was fully restored to his kingdome. Scipio being returned to the City of Rome, had the glery of a most konourable and noble triumph : whom, Q. Terentius Calleo, a Senator, followed with a cap [of freedome] upon his head. Scipio was furnamed Affricanus : but doubtfull it is, whether be came by that title through the fa- M went of his fouldiers before or the general applante and affection of the people. But this is certain that be was the first general that ever was intitled in his stile with the surname of a nation by himself comgnered.

The thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Hen Cn. Servilline Capie, and C. Serviline Geminne (Coff. in that year, which by computation was the 16 of the 2 Punick war) proposed unto the Senat, concerning the affairs of the State, the managing of the wars, and the government of the provinces a the LL ordained and gave order, that the Coss, should either agree N beween themselves, or else calt lots whether of them should go into the Brutian land against Ansibal : and whether should take upon him the charge of the province of Herraria and the Ligarians : with commission for him, whole hap it was to rule the province of Brutii, to receive the stmy from P. Semprenise the Conful; and the faid P. Semprenise (for he also as Vice-conful was to continue in place of government one year longer) to succeed in the room of P. Licinim, who was to return home to Rome. This P. Sempronius among other commendable parts (wherein no Citizen in his time was counted more sufficiently furnished than himself) was taken also for a brave wartior and man at arms. For being richly endued with all those good bleffings that either nature or fortune can afford upto a man, he was both noble in birth, and wealthy in inbitance. In beautifull personage he excelled for strength of body he far surpassed. Of tongue and speech he was thought most eloquent, whether he were to plead a cause at the bar, or occasion offered either in O Senat house or before the assembly of the people to perswade or diffwade, to give countel one way or other. In the Pontificiall canons and laws, he was fingularly well learned and skilfull. Befides all these praise-worthy qualities (I say)his Consulthip had given him exeperience also in military affairs, and made him a worthy jouldier. The fame order that was taken for the Brutisms province, was also decreed for Betraria and the Ligurians. M. Cornelius was commanded to put over and deliver up his army to the new Conful; and himfelf to continue still in government, and to rule the province of France with the firength of those legions which L. Scribonius the Pretor had under his charge the year before. After this, the Confuls calt lots for their provinces. Unto Ganid fellthe Brutis, unto Servilius Geminus, Hetravia. Then the Pretors provinces allo were one to the choice of lottery. And P. Elim his lot was to have the jurisdiction of the City of Rome: P. Len tulus to rule Sardinia : P. Vilius to govern Sierly : and Quintilius Varus to have the charge of Ariminam with two legions, which were commanded by Sp. Lucretius, And Lucretius had his commission revived again for a longer time, to the end, that he might reedifie the town Genna. which by, Mago the Carthaginian had been rafed and destroied. As for P. Scipie, his commission B and government was not limited by any expresse time, but only with the end of the wars, and to continue untill those wars in Africk were fully determined. A decree also passed, that there should be a folemn procession and supplication holden to this effect, and in these terms, that wheras he had failed over into the province of Africk, this voiage and expedition of his might turn to the fafety and good of the people of Rome, of himfelf, and his army. In Sicily were enrolled three thousand souldiers. And for as much as the whole strength and manhood of that province had been shiped over into Africk: for fear lest some Armado should cut over out of Africk, it was thought expedient to guard all the fea coalts of Sicily, with a fleet of 40 fail. And Village had with him into Sicily 12 ships, newly built; the rest of the old ships in Sicily were required. For Admirall of this armado was apointed M. Pomponim the Pretor of the former year, whose government C was prorogued, and he embarked the new fouldiers brought out of Italy. The like number of thiss the LL of the Senat affigued unto Cn. Offavins the Pretor of the former year, with the fame commillion of government, for to defend the coalts of Sardinia. And Lentulus was commanded to allow unto the Pretor 2000 fouldiers for to man and furnish those ships. Moreover, the sea coasts of Italy, because it was uncertain to what parts the Carthaginians would make out their navy (and like it was, that where they should cipy any place weak and disfurnished of sufficient (trength and garrifon, thither they would direct and bend their forces) were committed to M. Martin the Pretor of the former year, that he should scour the seas, and keep that side, with as many thips as the other. And for to furnish that fleet of his, the Confuls by order from the Senat enrolled three thouland fouldiers, and referved two legions belides, against all doubtfull chances of war n what dever the As for the two provinces of Spain, together with the armies there, and the whole government they were appointed to the old Generals, L. Lentulus, and L. Manlius Acidinus. So the Roman wars for that year were mainteined with 20 legions in all & with a hundred and fixty thins of war. Then the Pretors were commanded to take their journey into their feveral provinces. But the Confuts were charged before they departed from the City, to exhibite thole great Games, which To Manlim Torquarm the Dictator had vowed against the 5 years end, if so be the Commonwealtenhained in the fame good and fortunat efface, during that time. Now there entred into mens minds new doubts and strange temples of conscience, by reason diversatedigious fights and tokens reported out of many places. For believed it was that certaine raveds no brilly pecked and rafed with their bils, but also eat and devoured the gold in the Ca-E pitoll And Swiffing the mice and rats gnawed a crown of gold. About Caput, a huge number of loculte (but from whence they came, no man knew for certain) overspred all the grounds, and filled the fields. At Rease there was a horse-colt foled with five feet. At Anagnia were seen in the element, ratific field divers fire lights thooting and flathing tiere and there; and afterwards a mighty blaffing comet burning. At Frafise a certain arch compafied the fun with a thin course like aline sand afterwards a greater circle of the fun chelofed the full rundle from without-forth. Inthe electron of sirely the earth in a plain champain field letted and lunk down and made an exceeding guid ethicky gary one of the Confine killed the fift beaft for facrifice, the liver thereof was found headlefs. continued ftill. And for mine own part, I would rather believe that these matters were treated upon by entercourse of messengers, as most writers do report, than that Syphan himself in person, as Antias Valerius recordeth, came into the Roman camp to aparle and conference thereabout. At the first the Roman Generall, would scarcely lend his ear to hear those overtures : but afterwards, to the end that there might be some colourable and probable cause for his people to refort unto the camp of the enemies, he seemed not so streight-laced, nor to deny the same articles so stiffly, but pretended some hope, that by often debating thereof to and fro between them, they should at length grow to some good point and finall agreement. The wintering harbours of the Carthagian nians were in a manner all of wood, but built of flender fluff gathered out of the fields at a venture hand over head, where they could meet withall. The Numidians for the most part lay in cabbins and sheds, watled and wound with reeds especially, and covered and thatched with mats of sedge t and fuch like, here and there feattering without all order : in fuch fort, as some of them taking up their lodging at their own pleasure, without direction and commandment of any officer, quartered without the trench and rampier. Scipie advertised hereof, conceived good hope to find some opportunity one time or other to fire the camp of the enemies. Upon a certain day therefore, he fent in train of those Commissioners whom he addressed unto Syphax, in stead of pages and drudges, and difguited in flaves and bondmens weeds, the bravelt fouldiers of a band, fmen of approved valor, wildome and discretion) who whiles the commissioners were busic in conference. should range about the camp, some one way, some another; to espie and mark all the passages and waies in and out; the fite and form generally of the whole leaguer, and particularly of every part ; where the Carthaginians quartered ; where the Numidians lodged , what diffance there K was between Afdrubal his tents, and the Kings pavilions ; to observe also and learn withal, the order & the manner of their fentinels, their ward and watches, whether by night or by day they lay at more vantage to be surprised by an ambush. And according as there were divers meetings & conterences, and fo of purpole some were sent one time, some at another; to the end that more & more ftill should have the spiali and full knowledge of all things in the enemies camp. Now when as often that this matter was treated of, the greater hope of peace both Syphax had and the Carthagia mians likewife by his means; the Delegates or Commissioners aforelaid of the Romans, faid that they were exprelly forbidden by their Generall to return without a full and resolute answer. And therefore they willed him to make short work at once, and to bethink himself what to do, either to frand upon his own determinat purpole (if he were resolved) or else to consult with Aldrabal L and the Carthaginians, and determine accordingly. For now high time it is, fay they either to conclude peace, or to profecute war freshly, and to go through with it leftily. Thus while Seiber consulted with Afdrubal, and Afdrubal with the Carthagians, both the espials had sufficient time to view and see all, and Scipio also good leasure to provide necessaries for his purpose. Moreover, by this motive and hope of peace, as well the Carthaginians as the Numidians, beganiar commonly in such cases it fallethout) to be negligent and stack in forecast, and to provide that in the mean while they came by no harme and detriment from the enemie. At length an answer was returned and some clauses put in, without all reason, and sounding to much inconvenience by occafion that the Rom ins feemed too too fain and defirons of a peace. Which fell out very fitly for Scipio whole only delire was to pick fome just quarrell for to break the truce and abitinence of war. M and so the next day (for in the mean time he faid he would confer with his Counsel) he answered the Kings messenger in this wife, that besides himself alone, who laboured all in vain and could do no good, there was none liked of the peace . and therefore he willed him to report anto the King his mafter, that there was no other hope for Syphem to have peace with the Romans, milefle he renounced and cast off quite the friendship of the Carthaginians. And thus he ended the truce, that with free confcience being discharged of his promise in that behalf, he might go forward in his delignments, and bring his enterprise to his defired iffue. So beving put his thing to fee (for now the prime of fpring was come) be embarked in them his attillery, his ordinance and engins of battery, as if he meant to affault Veica on the les fide. And from out two thousand lost diers, to postelle themselves of the hill that overlooked Vices, which he had held and kept before, N both to withdraw the minds of the enemies from that, which he (ceretly deligned and intended & amule them upon the care and regard of another thing, and also to prevent a mischief that whites himself should go against Syphan and Aldrabal, they might not fally forth of the City, and affail his camp, left with a fanall guard to defend it. Having made this way, and laid this ground acceptand, he affembled his councell, where he commanded as well the forefaid spies to lay forthand utter what they had feen and found, as also Mafaniffa, who was acquainted with all the manerand fafhions of the enemies : and then at last he declared and she wed unto them, what himself intended to execute the next night. Then he gave commandment to the Tribunes on Kn. Marshels, that to foon as the councell was rifen, and the court difmified in the Generals pavilion, at the first found of trumpets immediately they should bring their legions out of the camp. Thus according to his @ edict, the enfigns began a little before sun-ferting to let forth. About the first watch they put the fouldiers in array ready for to march, and by midnight (for they were to journey leven miles) they going a fair and foft pace, approached the enemies camp. There Scipio gave unto Laline a part of the forces together with Majariffa and his band of Numidians, with direction to invade the camp of Syphax, and to let fire thereupon Then calling them by themselves both spart one from theother, Lalins I me n and Majarifa, he carnelly belought them of all love to make up and

A recompence by carefull indultrie and devoir that providence and forecast, which the darkness of the night disappointed them of. As for himself, he meant to let upon Afdrubal and the Carthaginian camp : but begin he would not, before he faw the fire amongst the kings tents. And it was not long first ere it began: for as soon as the fire caught hold of the next pavilions whereupon it was call, by and by it took all that were neerest, and so forward to those that joyned unto them. it fred into all places of the camp. And verily into a great fright they were all put, as they could not choose, but needs must in a night scarefire, which was run all over in so short a time. Howbeit they thought it some fire by milchanceonly, and not the hand of the enemy, by occasion and means of war : and therefore unarmed as they were, and lightly appointed without weapons, they ran forth by heaps to quench the fire, and light full upon their armed enemies, the Numidians e-B specially, who by Masantsa that was well acquanized with the maner of the Kings camp, were bestowed in convenient places, at the ends of every avenue and passige. Many in their very beds and couches, between fleeping and waking, were confumed with the flome on many running headlong in this their hally flight, one upon an other, were in the flreights of the gates troden under foot, or elfe thrust and crusht to death. The Sentinels and watch of the Carthaginians, espied at first the fire shiring and slaming out ; after whom others awakened and raised out of their nests by this nightly tumult and alarm, might behold and plainly fee the same: but they likewise were deceived as well as the other, and believed verily that the fire began of it felf by some mistortune, no man wift how. The confused noise and ery allo, which was heard whilesthey were a killing. flying and wounding, would not suffer them to know the truth indeed, whether the lame arole C upon their affright and suddain fear by night, or otherwise. And therefore every man naked as he was, and inspecting no practife at of all the enemy, at all the gares as they ftood next, did whas could to bring with him such instruments and means as were to put out the fire : and hapned m awares upon the army of the Romans. Now after they were all massacred and put to the sword to to the last man, not only upon an ordinary hatred between enemies, but also bec. use there might not escape so much as one to carry newes unto the rest : Scipio immediatly entred the gates, being not warded, but altogether neglected, as in such a fearfull garboil and burlyburly it was no marvell. They fell a flinging of firespon the lodgings and sheds that stood next, so as the flame brake out and shewed at first as if it had been dispersed in many places: but afterwardscatching and ipreding from one tent to another as they joyned cloic together, they were all at once on a h light fire, and burnt every flick down to the ground. Men and cattell both, finged and forched at the first, as they ran in piteous and fearfull fort away : but afterwards as they tumbled one upon another by heaps, stopped and choked up all the waies and avenues of the gates. And look who cleaped the fire, felupon the edge of the I word. Thus in one day were 2 camps clean confumed. Howbeit, both the Generals, and of to many thousands of armed men, only 2000 foot and 500 horic armed by halfs, and many of them either wounded or elfe finged and half rofted with the fire, got away and escaped. There eighet were flain or burnt to ashes u pon 40000 men; taken prisoners there were above 6000 : among whom there hapned to be many gentlemen of the Carthaginians, and II Senators. Of enligns were taken 178, Of Numidian horses for service more than 2700. Six Elephants got alive, eight perifhed either with fire or fword; and a mighty deal of armor E c.me to their hands : all which the L. General Scipio confectated to Valcan, and let on fire. Afdrabal with some few Africans that fled with him, rid away upon the spur to the next City: and thithet got all reft, who remained alive, following the tracks of their captain, and there faved themselves. But afterwards left that City should be yielded to Scipio, he quit the place and departed. Anon the Romans were received within the fame at the gates standing open for them : and because willingly of themselves they rendred the town, there was no kind of holtility of violence offered unto them. But two other Cities one after another were forced and put to the ranfack. Allahat pillage, as also whatsoever was saved out of the fire in the two camps, was freely given to the fooldiers, Syphax encamped and fortified himfelf in a ftrong hold, almost eight miles off. But Afarabal made halt to Carehage, for fear left upon the fuddain fright occasioned by this fresh F and late overthow, things should go backward, and the Senat resolve upon some unmanly and unworthy courie. Thither at the first arrived such fearfull news, that all men thought verily that Scipio would give over Vices and forthwith lay fiege unto Carthage : whereupon there Suffetes (who are the Confuls as it were, of the City) called the Senat . where three opinions were delivered amongst them. , The first advited to dispatch Embassadors to Scipio to treat for peace : the fecond, to fend for Annibal home to the defence of his own country, against fo dangerous and deadly a war : the third gave counsell, by example of the Romans constancy and resolution in their advertity, to repair the army and gather new forces, and to request Syphan not to abandon and give over the quarrell. This opinion, because Afdrubal was in place (and all those that sided with the Barchine house and faction, evermore inclined to war) prevailed and took effect. Here-G noon they began to take musters in town and country . Orators were addressed to Syphan, who of himlest with all his might and main, was busied to leve fresh forces, and preparing for new war. For his wife now, not as aforetime, by inticing words, flattering speeches, and plea-"fant allurements, that might serve the turn to win and move the heart of an amorous lover, Courb way of prayer and pititull compassion had prevailed so much with him already a yes, "and with plenteous tears belought him, not to betray her natural father and native country, nor time Corribageto be burne with flaming fire, like as the camps were confumed already

"The Embassadors also brought with them new hopes besides, which were presented auto them H in as happy a time as might be; who reported, that they fortuned to meet with 4000 Celtiberians brave and lusty young men, about the City named Olba, which had been levyed and hired in Spain by their Commissioners, of purpose sent to take up new souldiers; and that Assamble himself in person would be present with a power of no small importance. Sphax not only entertained these Oratours with gracious speeches and courteous answers, but also shewed them a great number of Numidians, gathered out of the country towns; which some sew daies before he had surnished with armour and horses, promising besides, that he would assemble all the young and able men for service throughout his whole realm. For well he wist, that the late solfee and dester happed by occasion of fire, and not by sight: and never in war is a man to be required inferiour, before he be vanquished by mere sorces in ranged battell. In this wise answered he I the Embassadours, And after some sew daies Assamble and Sphax once again joyned their forces together; so as in all, their host amounted to the number well neer of 30000 armed men.

Now when Scipio was wholly fet upon the affault of Vica, and at the point to bend his ordnance and artillery against the wals, as thinking verily that the war was already done with Stphax and the Carthaginians; the same of the war renewed by them afresh, averted him from his purpole, and caused him to give over that enterprise for a time. So leaving behind him certain imali guards, as well by water as land, only for a fign and thew of fiege; himielf with all the firength of his army, fet forwards to meet the enemy. At the full he fare him down and encamped upon an hill, four miles (or very neer) diftant from the Kings camp. The next day after, he deanded with his cavaltyl'down into the great Plains or Downs (for to they call them) lying neer fame hill; and ipent that whole day in braving the standing corps de guard of the enemies before their camp, and playing upon them with skirmishes. And to for two dates together next enfuing, they paffed the time in divers tumultuous excurtions between the one part and the other, without doing any great exploit worth the remembrance. On the fourth day, thy entredon both fides into the field, and embattailed themselves. Scopio marshalled his men in this wife : Behind the Principes in a vanguard, he placed the formost entigns of his Hastati, or Spears; and the Triarji he bestowed in the rereward, for to second them. The Italian horsemen he set in the right point: the Numidian horse and Masanifa beranged in the left. Syphan and Asarabal put their T Numidians horie opposit to the Italians, and the Carthaginians to affront Majaniffa. In their main battell were planted the Celtiberians, to make head against the ensigns of the Reman Legions. Thus ordered and arranged, they encountred one nother, and joyned battell. At the first onlet, both wings at once, as well the Numidians as the Carthaginians, were put back and forced to give ground: for neither the Numidians (being for the most part country people and ruftic. II) were able to receive the Roman horiemen; nor the Carthaginians (raw and untrained fouldiers) sufficient to hold out with Mafaniffa; who (besides all other things) for his late and fresh victory, was to terrible, as there was no dealing with him. So the battell of the Celtiberians, (naked and disfurnished of both her points) stood still; for neither saw they any likely hood to escape and lavethemselves by flight, considering they knew not the coast of the country; nor M hope to obtain pardon at Scipio his hand, against whom, (deserving so well of them and their nation) they were come into Africk with a power of waged mercenary fouldiers. So being environed on every fide with the enemies, they fell one upon another, and obstinatly dyed to the last man. But whiles all the enemies were wholly employed about them, Syphax and Afdrahal gained themselves some time to get away & cscape. The victors (wearied rather with continual killing than long fighting) were overtaken with the night. The morrow after, Seipie lent anto Lalim and Majan Ja, with all the Roman and Numidian horfe, and the nimbleft and appointed footmen, after Syphax and Afdrabal for to follow the chafe. Himfelf with the strength and body of that army, subdued all the Cities thereabout that were within the seignory of the Carthaginians whom he partly forced by assault, and partly took by furrender for tear. Great was the fright ye may N be fire at Carthage: and they thought no other but that Scipio being now in the train of conquel would make halt to overrun the countrey; and when he had once brought under his subjection (and that with speed) all the other States there bordring, then at once he would come to assault Cartbage. Therefore they fell to repair and make up the breaches of their wals, and to fortifie them with firong bulwarks: and every man did his best to bring out of the country all kind of provision, against the time they should abide a long and tedious siege. Few words or none at all of peace, but much talk of fending Embassadors to call home Annibal. The greatest part were of mind & gave advice, to make out the armado which stood ready rigged, for to intercept the Romabs victuals, and to surprise and assault the Romans fleet, riding before Vicea retchiesly without fear, and diltrulting nothing : for peradventure they might also force the navall camp, left witha finall guard for the defence thereof. And to this countell the moil enclined; yet they thought it good to lend Embassadors to Annibal. For suppose that their navy should speed full well, and have the happiest inccess that they could wish, this only good would come thereof, that Vica thereby might be in some fort calculof the streight fiege wherewith it was invested : as for the defence of Carrbage it felf, they neither had any other Generall befides Annibal, not army left but only his. Whereupon the next day after, the thips were that into the water, and let affore: and withall the Embassadors took theirs way towards Italy. All things were hudled up and done

A in halt; such was their fortune that pricked them forward, and gave them no further time. And look if any one man sacked his business never so little, hewas reputed to betray the whole state, and the safety of all.

Scipio now marching with an army, loden with the spoil and pillage of many Cities; sent the prisoners away, and all the prizes besides, unto the old camp before Vites. And wholly set upon the conquest of Carthage, he surprised Tunes (a City abandoned of her guard left for defence) fituat from Carthage almost twelve miles. The place, both by mans hand was strongly fenced, and by nature furely feated : and as it might be easily feen from Carthage, fo it yeelded a goodly profpect to Carthage, and allo to the lea all about Carthage. From thence the Romans (as they were hard at work, in fortifying themselves with a trench and rampier) discovered the enemies fleet, failing from Carthage towards Vtica. Laying therefore their work afide, they founded the remove, and B presently in all hast advanced their entigns, to prevent that their own ships which stood close to the shore, bent wholly to the siege, and nothing fitted and furnished for a lea-fight, might not be surprised and boorded. For how possibly could thips heavily charged, carrying artillery, ordnance and engine of battery, be ever able to withfland an Armado nimbly appointed, rigged and trimmed for the purpole with all ship furniture meet for battell, and manned besides with armed souldiers? How might our ships (I say) withstand the enemy, which either are converted to the nie of merchant-thips of burden; or elie fo neer ferto the wals, that they ferve in ftead of a platform and bank, or elle of bridges to enter upon the City? Scipio therefore, after he was thither come, and had bestowed his wars ships with brasen beaks behinds in the rereward near to land, which (as the manner is in fight at lea) might guard and defend the rest : opposed the Hulks and Caricks in a four-fold rankand courfe, in Itead of a wall afront the enemie. And because that in the tumult of the fight, those ranges might not be broken and disordered, he laid the masts and fail-yards over-croffe, reaching from thip to thip; and with throng cables he linked and fathred them all in one together, and laid boords and planks over them, that men might passe every way from one thip to another. But under those very bridges, he left certain spaces between, from whence the light pinnaces and frigots might make out to charge and recharge the enemy, and retire themselves thither again in safety, Having thus in hast (according as the time would give him leave) fer these matters in order ; there were to the number almost of a thousand elect and choice fouldiers put aboord into those ships of burden, to make head in the forefront, & withstand the violence of the enemies, and furnished they were with offensive weapons, but missive especially, to shoot and fling from them - and such store thereof they had together, as might serve for the assault were it never to long. Thus appointed and prepared, they waited the coming of the enemies. The Carthaginians, who if they had made good speed, might have surprised them unawares, and found all pell-mell and out of order whiles they were troubled, trighted, and to feek what to do upon that fudden occurence) fearing still as men out of heart and diffusyed with so many foils by land, and thereupon distrusting themselves even at the sea also; where (no doubt) they were the better and more puissant; and having trifled out all the live-long day, and failed but flowly; about the fun-let arrived in the haven, which the Affricans call Ruscinon. And the next morning by fun-riling, they put forth into the open fea, and ranged their thips in order, as against a fee navall battell ; suppo-E fing that the Romans would make out and receive them. When they had flood thus a long time. and perceived the enemies not to ftir or once to fet forward, then at last they charged upon the forefaid hulks and ships of burden. The service was nothing like a sea-fight, but resembling for all the world the ships that are to affaile the wals of some Town. For the hulks were a good deal taller and flood a loft over the enemies. And the Carthaginians out of their war ships armed and brelled with brasen beaks let flie many a dart in vain, as lancing them from beneath faintly against the higher place; whereas the shot from above out of the Caricks, was levelled with more strength and by reason of their own poiselight also with greater force. The light pinnaces for spial, and the other imal backs, which made fallies from under the bridges aforefaid, framed of planks upon masts and fail-yards, at the first were encountred, overcharged and hidden only with the violence and g greatness of those war-ships: but afterwards they were some trouble to the defendants of their own fide; for that being intermingled amongst the enemies ships, their own fellows were forced oftentimes to Itay their hands, and neither shoot arrow, nor lance dart, for fear of milling their enemies, and lighting amongst their own part. At the last, the enemies from out of the Carthaginian ships, began to cast out certain loggers, with iron books at the end (which the souldiers ule to call Harpagones) [Grapples] for to take hold upon the Roman ships. Which when the Romans were not able to cut in funder, no more then the very chains whereto they hung, and whereby they were flung, then we might have teen (as any one of their enemies war shi and gallies rowed back, and towed after it a Roman Carick hanging by the grapple end) the boords and ropes cut afunder, by which it was tied and fastned unto others, or elle another range & and course of more ships together, to follow after the tail of the other. By this device especially were all the bridges torn and rent in peaces, and fearcely had the defendants any time and space to retire and passe into the second rank of ships behind. Thus there were about the Carneksof the Romans drawn away to Carthage, hanging at the poops of their gallies. Their gladnelle and rejoyeing hereat was much greater than the thing it felf came to, and the more acce ptable in that amidit to many continual lofter and plenteous tears of theirs, one only joy as H fmall as it was, thining upon them beyond their expectation, caled and lightned their hearts: confidering withall how neer by all likelyhood and appearance the Roman armado was to a milehief andfinall defirmation, had not the captains of their own gallies fereflowed fo much, and Seipie come in time to help.

It fortuned about the same time, that Lalism and Majaniffa were come within 15 daies into Numidia; the Mafæivlians rendered Mafani fa the ancient realm belonging to him by inheritance from his father, and received him with joy, as their King whom they had long time defired. Syphax feeing his captains and garrifons diffeized and displaced, kept himselfe within the ancient limits of his own Kingdome, but was not like to be long at reft and quiet. For his wives father on the one fide, and his wife again on the other, fet him on, and pricked him forward continually to make arms againft the Remanstand fo doted he on her in excessive love, that needs he must veeld to her, there was no remedy. Befides, so mighty he was in numbers of men and horse, that the puissance of a Kingdome flourishing so many years together, offering and presenting it telf daily to the cie, had been enough to have made a Prince proud, that was not to barbarous and uncivill as he, and had some better rule and mastry of his affections then himself had. When he had affembled together as many as were able for lervice, he furnished them with horses, and with armour, as well offensive as defensive. The Cavalry he forted and divided into small troops and cornets, the infantry into the cohorts and squadrons, according as he had learned long fince of the Roman centurions. And thus having raifed an army, equall for number to the former, but standing altogether in manner, of new and untrained fouldiers, he put himself on his journey against K the enemies. And after he had encamped neer unto them, at the beginning some few light horsemen advanced forward from the corps de guard, in espiall, so neer as they might with safety, but being let back from thence with arrows & javelins, they retired unto their companies. After this they began on both fides to make out one against another, and to maintain light skirmishes; and when of any part they had taken the foil, they would again for anger return in greater number which is the wonted manner to kindle a battell between horsemen : for whiles the winners hope still of better, and the loofer chafes for having the worse, the company ever encreaseth on both fides. And thus now, after some few had scuffled and blowed the coals, at length the wholearmie of either part, came forth into the field eager of fight, and to strike a fet battell. So long as the horse service, the Mase sylians were to many, as there were hardly any dealing with them, Syphan I. fent them out in such great troops : but after that the Roman footmen once had suddainly entred between the cornets of their hortemen, which gave way as they came, and had gotten fure footing and made head, and to frighted the enemy charging fofree upon the four as he did then, the Barbarians began to ride their horles more casily, and within a while gently to stand still; and in the end, not only to give ground to the footmen, but also to retreat from the horsemen, who now were the more bold and hardy, being flanked with a guard of footmen.

And now by this time the standards of the legions advanced forward, and approached neer hand. But when the Massasyli were so far from receiving and enduring their first charge, that they might not abide the very fight to much, as of their enfigns and armour, to mightily wrought with them either the remembrance of former overthrows already passed, or the present fear of immi- M nent danger. Where Syphax, whiles he rodebravely in the face of the enemies troops and fourdrons, if happily for very thame, or for the perill of his own perion, he might flay his men from running away, had his horse under him fore wounded, and being cast off his back to the earth, as overpressed with the number, taken pritoner, and brought alive unto Lalius, for to represent unto Mafanissa above all others a goodly shew and joyfull fight to behold. Now was Ciriba, the head City of all the Kingdome of Syphax; and thither after the flight, betook themselves a mighty multitude of people. The flaughter in this battell was lefs in proportion, then the victory, because the horsemen only maintained the conflict. Not above five thousand were slain, and not halfe so many taken prisoners. And when they had made an assault upon the camp whither the frighted multitude after the loffe of their King, had retired, Majaniffa came unto Lalins and faid, that for the prefent N there could be nothing more pleasing and honourable unto him, then upon his victory to visit and ice his fathers Kingdome, which he had recovered and won again after to long a time. But as in advertity, to likewife in prosperity (qd,he) tract of time and delaies are never good. In case therfore Lalius would permit him and his horiemen, together with conquered Syphax to go before unto the City Cirtha, he would turprife them on a fuddain, finding all out of frame and to feek by reason of this to suddain and unexpected fear : and Laline with his sootmen might travell fair and thitly, and come after with easie journies. Lalins yeelded hereunto. Whereupon, being gone a-Tore unto Cirtha, he commanded the principall Citizens of Cirtha to be called forth unto a parle. But all the whiles that they were ignorant of the Kings unhappy fall, and fo long as Majanifa uttered nothing of that which was hapned, he might not prevail either with threats or faire O words and perfwasions untill he presented the King before them a bound prisoner. Then at so heavy an object and milerable spectacle, they lift up a pitifull cry, and made great lamentation. And partly for fear they abandoned the defence of the wals, and partly by a general confentto court the Conqueror, and to leek for grace and favour at his hands, they fet the gates open-Then Mafaniffa, after he had bestowed about the gates, and in convenient places of the wals, certain strong guards, to keep that no man should stir and make an escape, he rode a gallop to the

A roial pallace, for tobe policifed of it. As he entred within the fore-gates thereof, even in the very entrance of the porch, Sophonisha the wife of Syphan, and daughter of Aldrubal the Carthaginian, met him on the way and espying in the mids of the armed train Masaniffa full gorgeously dight, as well in his brave armor, as in other goodly array and ornaments, imagining him to be the King (as he was indeed) the fell down proftrat at his feet, and spake in this wife; "True it it is (quoth the) O Mafaniffa, that the Gods above, together with your own wertne aud fidelity " have given you full power and puissance, to doe with us according to your parafure. but if it be "lawfull for me a poor prisoner and captive woman, to open my mouth and make an humble "freech unto my Lord, and in whole only hands lieth my life and death; if I may be to bold to "touch your knees, and that victorious right hand of yours; I would befeech and pray you for B . the honour of the rotall majesty of a Prince, wherein we also our telves erewhile were interesse fed; in the love and name of the Numidian nation, which now is common to you and Syphax, who the domesticall gods, protectors of this regall house and princely palace, who vouchtate to " receive you into it at this prefent with better prefages and more fortunat tokens, then lately they " fent Siphax out of it; to deign me a lowly impliant this favour, and grant me this petition, as to "determin your felt of me your captive whatfoever pleafeth you, & not to suffer me to fall into the " proud hands and inhumane disposition of any Roman. If there were nothing elie but this, that I " was sometime wise and Queen to Syphax, yet would I rather trie the courtesie and humanity of "a Numidian, and one born in Africk as well as my felf then of a stranger and slien. But "what hard measure a Carthaginian lady, and the daughter of Afdrubal, may fear at a Ro-Ca mans hand, you fee and know full well. Wherefore once again I request and intreat your highneffe upon my knees, to regard my init . and if there be no way elicto fave and keep me from the will and appetite of the Romans, to put me to death out of hand. For beauty the surpassed and wasincomparable : for years lufty, and in the very best of her age. And therefore when as now the held him falt by the hand, and requested his protection and honourable word, only for this, that she might not be delivered and betrayed to a Roman, placing & tetting her words to well, and couching them to cunningly, that they founded neerer to speeches for to win love, then prayers to crave pity. " fee the fanfie and affection of this victorious Prince! he enclined prefently not only to mercy and compassion, but also (as all the kind of these Numidians are ful of love, and have no stay of their wanton luft)a conqueror otherewise though he were, yeelded himself prisoner to the love of his captive: D and after he had given her his right hand for assurance to perform her requelt, he went into the palace. This done he began to cast about with himself how he might make good his promise unto Sophonisha: but finding no meanes elfe to compais and bring it about, he borrowed foolish, rash, and shameless countell of blind love. He made no more ado, but commanded in all hast to prepare that very day for the folemnization and marriage with Sophonisba, because he would give neither Lalius, nor Scipio himfelf, any liberty at all to proceed against her as a prisoner, after the were once the wedded wife of Mafaniffa. The wedding was no fonner done, but behold Lelius came, a guelt unfent for and nothing welcome: who to little difsembled how much he milliked the thing, that he was once about to have plucked her forth of the bride-bed, and fent her away even with Syphax and other prisoners to Scipio. But overcome with the earnest prayers of Masanista, who E belought and importuned him to refer the matter over to Scipio, for to arbitrat and decide unto whither of the two Kings Sophouis ba should be awarded, for to mend their state, and better their fortune the fent away Siphax alone with the rest of the prisoners, and by the help of Masaniffa, wan and recovered the other Cities in Numidia, which were held by the garrisons of the King. When news came into the camp that they were bringing Syphax thither, all the multitude went forth as it were to behold a triumph. Himlelf went bound before all the relt, and a number of Numidian noblmen and glentlemen followed after. Then every man to fet forth and amplifie this victorie, magnified what he could the greatness of King Syphax, and the glorious renown of the nation, in these termes: That he was the King, unto whole majesty thetwo most mighty and pulfant states of the world, to wit, the Romans and the Carthaginians attributed to much, that F Scipio the Generall of the one, for to feek his amity, left the province of Spain and the army there, and with two Caravals or Gallies ruled with five banks of oars, failed over into Affrick. and Afdrabal the great commander of the Carthaginians, not only repaired himself in perfon unto him into his Kingdome, but also gave him his daughter in marriage . so as at one time he had in his power the two grand-captains, of Carthaginians and Romans both. And like as both these nations killed sacrifices unto the immortall gods, and craved thereby their grace and favour, so of both parties at one time was his friendship sought for, and defired. And as for his power and puillance, it was to great, that he expelled Magna out of his own Realm, and drave him to this natrow point, that the belt meanes he had to preferve his life, was either the running rumour of his death, in the lurking holes of the wild-woods, wherein he was glad to live G by rapine and steatth, after the guise of savage bealts. The King thus talked of in every mans month that it ood about him, was brought at length into the Pratorium or Generals pavilion, and there presented unto Scipio. And Scipio verily was much moved in mind to consider the former state and fortune of the man, compared now with his present condition : and to remember withall and call to mind the hospitall interteinment, the giving interchangeably of the right hand, and the covenant between them made both in publick and private. In these regards likewise Syphax took heart, and spake more frankly unto the conquerour. For when Scipio demanded of him

"What he meant, and for what intent he not only renounced alliance with the Romans, but also H began himfelf first to make war upon them : he made answer again and confessed, That he had " indeed done amis, and plaid the fool. As for his taking armes against the people of Rome. that was not the beginning of his folly, but rather the very end of his frantick fottifhness. Then it 66 was, and never elfe but then, that he went befides himfelte and was bereft of his wits then he "abandoned out of his mind and clean forgat, as well private entity by a hospitall entertainment, as all publick ananceby tolenn covenants; when as he received into his house a Carthagini-"an lady for his wife: then his toyall court and palace was fet on fire & burned with those nuptiall "torches. That furious fiend it was (quoth he) and peltilent dame, that by all kind of pleasant al-"luring baits, and flattering enticements poffested my mind, drew away and alienated my heatt and "never rested she, untill with her own hands she laid upon my body impious and ungodly armour " against my owne guest and loving friend. And yet as desperate and as wofull as my case is, in all " my mileries and calamities, this one thing doth me good and enjoyeth my heart, that I fee the "fame pelliferous tury, that fiend of hell, and lim of the Devill, gotten into the houle and family of "him, who is the most deadly and mortall enemy that I have in all world. Neither furely will Ma-" fanilla demean himfelt more wilely, foberly and constantly then Syphax : nay, considering his " youthfull years, he wil be as apt to be mil-led by love, and more inbject to the temptations of a woman. Certainly in this action of espousing her, he hathshewed more folly a great deal and 45 want of government. When he had uttered these words not only upon a spitefull hatred against st an enemy, but alto upon some new pricks of jealousie rising in his heart, seeing her whom he loved, in the possession of his concurrent, Scipio was driven into no small dumps, and wist not well w what to make of it. And as he began to be inspicious of Mafaniffa for this marriage, so, to speak a truth, the circumstances thereof hammered in his head, and made him conceive hardly of him: for fear that another day by the suggestions of the same woman, he would play false, and trespatte as well as Syphax. The marriage was to hudled up as it were in the mids of war and holility, without the advice, without the privity, and without the expectation of Lalim his company. Such hast he made all on the head, & without advisement, the very same day that he set eye first upon the queen his prisoner, he must needs espouse and marry her out of hand, and in the very house of his greatest enemy confummate and tolemnife the complements of facred wed-lock. Moreover to aggravate these matters and make them seem more foul and shamefull, Scipio knew full well, that Mafaniffa during the time that he remained in Spain a lulty young gentleman, it was never known 7 that he was enamoured upon the lovely beauty of any captive woman. As he toffed and revolved thele things in his mind, Lalius and Majanifa chanced to come in place. And after he had welcomed them both alike, and thewed them a loving and gracious countenance, yearnd honoured them with fingular praise and commendations openly in a frequent andience and court. he within his lodging took Masanifa into a secret place apart, and began to speak unto him in this manner: I suppole Masanifa, that you saw in me some good part, for love whereof both at the first "you were induced to come into Spain and contract amity with me; and afterwards alloin Africk, you repotedy our felf and all your hopes in my fidelity and protection. But of all those vere' tues, for which I have seemed worthy of your affectionat love, there is is not one wherein I may "fo much glory and take joy and take comfort, as in temperance, continency, and the bridling of M "carnall delights, and fleihiy pleasures. This vertue Masanifa, I wish that you also would have " joyned unto the rest that are in you to rare and and excellent. For our ages (trust we truly) stand-"eth not fo much in danger of armed enemies, as of those earthly pleasures that compasse us on "every side. And he that by his sobriety and governance bath been able to rule and tame the same, "hath woo himielf more honour, and gottten a greater victory, then we have done by the con-" quest and subduing of Syphax. What valiant exploits and worthy acts you have atchived in mine ablence I have willingly reported, and ftill remember. For the reft I had rather you would con-"fider of them by your felf, then change colour and bluth at my rehearfall of them. Syphanthrough "the good fortune, and by the forces of the people of Rome, is vanquished and taken prisoner. "And therefore himself, his wife, his realm, his lands, his towns, the inhabitants thereof, and N 45 finally all things else whatsoever that belongeth unto Syphax, are become a bootie to the people " of Rome. The King himtelf, and the Queen his wife, in case she had not been a citizen born of "Caribage, in cale we had not feen her Father to be at the grand Captain of our enemies, ought " by right to have been fent to Rome; that the Senat and people of Rome might passe their cen-" fure, a ward and judgement of her, who is reported to have alienated a confederat King from us, " and to have caused him rathly and inconsideratly to take armes against us. Strive then to rale and master your lusts and affects, take heed you stain not many good vertues with one bad "vice. Marre not the grace, deface not I say, the thank of many worthy deferts, by one fault and "trespais greater indeed, then the subject cause and occasion thereof. Majaniffa, whiles he heard these words, not only blashed as red as fire, but also began to water his plants. And when he had O promited for his part to be overruled and fet down by the Generall, and requeited him withall, to far forth as possibly the case would permit, to tender and regard his promise, wherein rashly and inconfideratly he had entangled himself, (for given his faithfull word he had, that he would not deliver and octray her into the hands and power of any other) he departed out of the Pretorium or Generall his court, all difmaied and exceedingly troubled in spirit and betook himself to his own pavillion. Where all folicary and alone by himfelf, after he had pasted over some time,

A with ferching many deep fighs and fobs, fo as he might eafily be overheard by them that flood about his tent, at the last he gave one grievons grone above the rest, and with that called for one of his trulty grooms, who had under his hand the keeping (as the maner was of Kings and Princes) of a foeciall poyfon, against all doubtfull chances that might happen. Which he commanded him to temper in a goblet of wine, and to carry it to Sophonisha, and withall to tell her thus much from him. "That Majanifa would have been most willing to perform his plighted troth and first pro-"mile, which an husband ought unto his wedded wife. But fince that the inperiour powers, and "thole that were mightier than himfelf, had bereft him of that puiffance and liberty, he was ready " and able yet to accomplish a tecond behelt, namely, that she should not come alive into the " hands of the Romans; and therefore he advited her, that in remembrance of her father a noble B " warrior and Commander, of her native country, of two Kings to whom she had been married. " she would provide for her self, and save her own honour. This credence and message, together with the poylon, the lervant when he was come unto Sophonisha, delivered unto her. Whereat. I " accept (quoth she) this marraige present, and welcome be it to me, if this be the best token that " a fusband could find to fend unto his wife. Yet thus much fignific unto him from me sgain, that " better content I would have been to die, if my marrange bed had not flood so neer to my grave. " She spake not the word so stoutly, but she did the deed as resolutely; for she took the cup in hand, " and shewed no sign at all of fear, she roundly drank it off. When tidings hereof came unto Scipio, for fear lest the hot, humorous, and passionat young Prince, might do hin felf some mischief, he presently sent for him. One while he gave him good & comfortable words; another while he gent-Clyrebuked him, inthat he would feem to make amends for one folly with another, and to play a more cruell and tragicall part then there was need. The next day after, to the end that he might withdraw his mind away from this present fit of troublesome fancies, he mounted pu into his Tribunall feat, and affembled an audience. There first, he openly styled Mafaniff , by the name of King, and honored him with fingular praises and commendations : which done, he gave him a golden crown, a fair cup like wife of gold, a chair of effate and a fcepter, both of ivory, a * rich long robe imbrodered of divers colours, and a coat wrought with needle work, representing the Date tree. These honourable presents wanted no words to set them out. For as (quoth he) there is nothing among the Romans more stately and magnifical than triumph, so they that ride in clavata prites. triumph, have no ornaments more rich and sumptuous then this, which the people of Kome esteem- tes sie palmata, Deth Mafaniffa only of all strangers and aliens to be worthy of. After this he gave Lalins also his due loge pitte reand deferved praises, and bestowed upon him a coronet of gold. Other martial men likewise accord- spondet. Caroing to the fervice which they had done, were rewarded with fundry gifts. The King having these hoIndia, sib 3. nours done unto him, was quieted and contented in mind, and conceived fome affured hope, now cap. 19, that Sphax was displaced & rid out of the way, shortly to compasse and enjoy the whole kingdome of Numidia. Then Scipio having fent C. Lelius with Syphax and other captives unto Rome, accompanied also with the Embaffadors of Mafaniffa, returned himself with his power again to Tunes. And there what fortifications and works he had begun afore, now he finished partectly and brought

The Carthaginians who were filled with a kind of joy that was not only short, but also in maner E vain and foolish, grounded upon their late assault of the Armado, which (considering their prefent flate) was fortunat enough; after they heard that Syphan was taken prisoner, in whom they had reposed more hope (well neer) then in Afdrubal and their own army, were mightily affrighted and daunted; and would give no more ear to any that perswaded war, but sent as orators to sue for peace, thirty of their principall ancients: and they amongst them were (as one would tay) their privy councell of state, and had the greatest power and authority to sway and overrule the whole body of the Senat. Who being entred into the Roman camp and the Generall his lodging and pavillion, fell down proftrat (after the manner and guife as I take it, of the countrey * from whence they were first descended) like those that worship & adore the gods. And to this their humble reverence, their language was intable and correspondent; not excusing themselves and Where, literate F their fault, but transferring the beginning and occasion thereof, upon Assibal and his favorites a in other counbout him and foothed him and bare him up in his wilfull pride and infolent ambition : craving par- tries of Afia, don for their City of Carebage, which twice already had been subverted and overthrown by the inconsiderer follows the considerer follows inconfiderat folly of her own citizens : yet once again you would gladly be faved and fland up- and very Idoright by the meanes and goodnesse of their enemies : for as much as they knew full well, that the latrous to their "people of Rome (ought not the utter extermination and destruction of those whom they had van- Princes, "quithed by force of arms, but only the loveraignty and rule over them: promiting fealty and ho-" mage to them ready to ferve in all loyalty, and to perform what foever it should please them to ime pole and lay upon them. Scipio made them this answer again, and said, that as he came into Africk supon hope to return home with conquest and not with peace; so that hope of his by the prospe-G " tous and happy successe of his wars hitherto, was much bettered and augmented. How-" beit although he affured himfelf of the absolute victory, as if he had it fait enough in his hand, "yet a good accord he would not refule: that all nations of the world might know, that the peo-"ple of Rome can both begin wars rightfully, and also end the same as justly. My will therefore (quoth he) and pleasure is, that the conditions of peace shall be these. Inprimu, that the Carthaginians shall restore and diliver back all the prisoners that they have taken in the wars : with

ef all the renegates and fugitives that have fled to their fide from us. Item, that they remove their

"forcesout of Italy and France, Items that they forbear to meddle in Spain. Item that they abandon H "and quit all the Hands between Italy and Africk. Item, to yeeld up all their ships of war faving "only twenty. Item, that they deliver unto the Romans, of wheat 500000 Modii, and of bar-"ley 300000. [Now what was the fum of money that he required or demanded of them, it is "not certainly agreed upon. In some writers I find 5000 talents: in others, five thousand pound "weight only of filver: and there be that have fet down, that they laid upon them a double pay of all the fouldiers \ Upon these conditions (faith he) whether ye will like of peace or no, ye " fhall have three dates respit and liberty to consult and consider. If you will accept therof in these et termes, make a truce with me for the present, and sent your Embassadors unto Rome to the Senat "there. Thus the Carthaginians, when they had agreed together, and concluded to refule no articles and conditions of peace whatfoever, were difmiffed. But in truth they fought for nothing else but delaies and tract of time untill Annibal were sailes over into Africk. So they addressed certain Embassadors unto Scipio to enter a truce: others they dispatched to Rome to treat for a peace: who brought with them for a shew, some few captives, renegates, and fugitives, to the end they might obtain their fute more eafily. But Lalius with Siphan and other captives (the principall nobles and gentlement of the Numidians) was many daies before arrived at Rome, and had declared unto the LL of the Senat all things in order as touching their good speed and successe in Africk, to the great contentment and joy of all men for the prelent, and with exceeding hope for the time to come. Then the LL. after confulration had, gave order that the King should be tent to Alba, there to lie in ward and safe custodie, and that Lalius should be kept still at Rome, untill the Cartheninian Embaffadors came. A folemn procession for four daies was decreed. And P. Aelius K the Pretor, after he had dismissed the Senat, called presently an assembly of the people, and together with C. Lalius went into the Roltra (or pulpit for publick orations,) Where the people hearing that the Carthaginian army was defeated, that the King of great name and renown was overcome and taken priloner; that all Numidia was overrun from one end to the other with a noble and fingular conquest; they could no longer contein their joy in filence, but in shouts and acclamations and other tokens (uluali in the affembly of a multitude) expresse and significatheir exceeding gladness and contentment of heart. Whereupon the Pretor immediately made proclamation, that the Church-wardens and fextons should set open all the holy temples and chappels throughout the City, and give the people liberty and leave all the day long, devoutly to go about the gods, reverently to falute them, and heartily to render thankigiving for this atchieved victory, T The next day following, he admitted the Embassadors of Masanifa into the Senat house, and gave them audience. Who first and formost rejoyced in the behalt of the Senat, for the prosperous " wars and happy successe of P. Scipio in Africk : than they gave thanks, that he not only had entituled Mafaniffa their lord and malter by the bare name of King, but also invested him a King in-"deed by restoring him to his fathers Kingdome. Wherein it it pleaseth the LL, of the Senat, he might reign, now that Syphax was removed and gone, without fear and trouble at all. Alio for "that he folemnly in the open affembly praised him in most honourable terms, and adorned him "richly with right stately and precious gifts. For to deserve which favors and honours done unto 66 him, as he had indeavoured already, to would be henceforth not fail to do his belt. Then they made a petition that the Senat would confirm and ratifie by their act and decree, his royall flyle M and title of a King, with other benefits and favours received of Scipio. And this moreover particularly Mafanifa would request (if he might be to bold, and that it stood with the pleasure of the Senat) that they would enlarge and let at liberty all the Numidian captives that lay in prilon in Rome : for this would be a thing whereby he should acquire much honour and reputation, and gain great love and favour amongst his people and countreymen at home. To these points the Embassador received this answer. Concerning the prosperous affairs of the wars in Africk, they congratulated likewife, and rejoyced reciprocally with the King. As for Scipio, they liked well, and confirmed his act in giving Mafaniffathe name of King : and therein he had done well and juftly and according to good reason. And whatsoever he had passed elte to the honour of Masanista, the LL approved and commended the same. Then they decreed certain presents that the Embassa- N dors should carry unto the King : to wit, two purple souldiers cassocks, each of them with aclasp of gold; and as many rich coats embrodered and bestudded with purple. Also two coursers barbed and trapped, with their rich capacitons : two complete armours for horses, with their cuitaces: likewife pavillions, with all their military furniture, in as full and ample manner as a Conful is allowed. These presents (1 say) had the Pretor direction to send unto the King. As for the Embalsadors themselves, there was bestowed upon them no less then 5000 Asses a peece; and upon their followers in the train, each of them 1000 Alses. Alio a double fuit of apparell for either of the Embassadors, and one single sute to every one throughout their train; as also to those Numidians, who being let at large out of prison, were to be delivered again to the King. Over and befides, there was appointed for the Embalsdors, lodging offree-cost; gardenage and walking O places of pleature; allowance for their table, and all provision elle whatsoever, at the Citiesex-

In that summer when these decrees passed at Rome, and those affairs were atchieved in A-frick, P. Quimissius Varus Pretor, and M. Cornelius Vice-consul, fought a set battell with Megothe Carchaginian, in the territory of the Insubstance, within the province of France. In the carchaginian, in the territory of the Insubstance, within the province of France.

vanguard were placed the legions of the Pretor. Cornelius kept the legions in the rereward, and A himself in person rode to the standards in the forefront. And before both wings, the Pretor and Vice-confull encouraged all that ever they could, the fouldiers for to advance the enfigns, and give a charge upon the enemy. But feeing he could not prevail not do any good, then quoth Quintilius to Cornelius: you fee how the fight flaketh and waxeth cooler, and the enemies that were timorous, are hardned and heartned by this relitance beyond their hope and expectation; yes, and it is to be feared, that they will turn to be hardy also, and make head against us. We must needs raife up a storm of Cavalry, if we would disorder them, and put them out of array. And therefore either do you maintain fight either in the front, whiles I bring the men of arms into the battell, or elie will I fight here in the vangaurd, whiles you fend out the horfemen of four legibatten, or the enemies. And when the Vice-confull was willing to accept of whether fervice the B Pretor would, then Quintilium the Pretor, with his fon aforenamed Mareus, a lufty young gallant, went to the horlemen, commanded them to mount on horfeback, and fuddainly all at once fent them against the enemy. The tumult and noise which the horiemen made, was answered& redoubled by the shout that the footmen set up. And verily the enemies battell had not been able to have kept their ground, but that Magoat the first stirring of the Cavalry, made out the Elephants forthwith into the battell, whom he had in readinesse for such purpose. At the uncouch braying, the ftrong smell, and hideous fight of which healts, the hortes were affrighted: and so the aid of home fight proved vain. And as the Roman Cavalry interfaced among the Infantry was more firong and forcible, where they had the nie both of lance point aloof, and of fwords edge close at hand : fo when they were transported and carried far off with their panting and fearfull horses, C the Numidians hortemen had the more room to shoot their darts against them with better advantage. Besides this disorder, the twelsth legion of footmen (whereof a great part was beaten down and flain, more for shame then upon any strength and valour, kept their place still; but never had been able to have held out any longer, but that the thirteenth legion drawn forth of the rereward into the vanguard, reenforced the battell that was in bazard and lay a bleeding and Mago withall for his part, came in with the Frenchmen out of the rereward, and opposed them againit this fresh legion; but when they were once discomfited and put back (which required no great ado nor long fight) the Haltati or Iaveliniers of the eleventh legion gathered round together and charged upon the Elephants, which now also began to break the ranks of the sootmen. But when they had tanced their javelins against them standing thick together in multitudes (and lightly D there was not one of them hit amifie but did his errand) they forced them all to turn back upon their own battell; to four of them were fore wounded and fell down dead. Then the vanguard of the enemies began fornewhat to give ground; and withall, the whole strength of the Roman footmen feeing the Elephants turn tail, came forward at once for to encrease the disordered tumult, and put them in greater fear. But so long as Mago stood stoutly to it, and standing in the forefront of the enligns, the ranks and files as they went back foftly, and retired by little and little, still maintained fight as before in good order: but after that they saw him shot through the thigh and fallen, and therewith carried forth of the battell for dead, incontinently they were all defeated and put to flight. There were flain of enemies about five thou fand, and of military enfigns eighteen won and carried away. The Romans likewise bought not this victory without losse of blood. For of the E Pretors army were loft two thousand and three hundred, and the greater part of them by far were of the twelfth legion. Whereof two Tribunes Military or Colonels also lost their lives, M. Cofeenine and M. Manine. Likewise of the thirteenth legion, which came last to the conflict, Cn. Hela visia Colonell, in renning the fight was flain, and eighteen men of arms befides, most brave and excellenthorsemen, with Centurions who were by the Elephants troden down, trampled under foot, and so perished. And no doubt the battell had continued longer, but that by occasion of the Generall his hurt, the victory was given away and yeelded. Mago in the dead time of the next night dislodged and departed; and stretching out his journey so far as possibly for his wound he might, he marched away until he was come to the lea fide, unto the Ingauni in Ligaria: where the Emballadors fent from Carebage (who a few daies before were arrived in the French gulf) re-F paired unto him commanding him with all speed possible to fail unto Africk, tor as much as his brother Annibal likewise (unto whom also there were Embassadors gone with the like message and commission) would do the same. For the State of Carthage now was not in case, nor upon terms to defend and keep in obedience by force of armes France and Italy, but to fee to home. Mag o not only moved with the commandment of the Senat, and the danger of his countrey, but fearing also left the enemy following the train of his victory, would puriue and set upon him, if he made long flay; and doubting left the Ligurians likewife, feeing Italy abandoned by the Carthaginians, Would revolt and turn unto those, under whose obedience they were like shortly to be reduced - albeit he had no hope that his hurt should have leffe shaking at sea by failing, then on land by travelling, or to find things there more handsome and ready for the cure, embarked bis army and departed, But before he was well gotten beyond the point and lands end of Sardinia, he died of his wound beforefaid. Certain thips also of the Carthaginians, being scattered afunder in the deep fea, were by the Roman Armado, that kept about the coast of Sardinia surprifed and boorded. These were the Acts performed both by sea and land, on the side of Italy which lieth along the Alps.

A When will that day come? and will it never be, that we shall (so Italy again electrof enemies, 1) obtain repote, and sourish once more injoying happy peace? Now at length, even at 16 yearsend 4 and not before, the gods have vouch fasfed us this beliffing; and no man sixth a word, nor maketh 4 a motion of thanksigning to their divine majetly therefore. And sixtly, if menknow not how to accept with joy and thankslunesse a benefit when it first cometh, they will be far short, and fail 6 menth more to remember the same when once it is past. Hereupon they cryed out and called a loud with one voice from all parts of the Senat-house to P. Allist the Present for the process of the same when once its past of the same when once its past.

Cn. Serviting the Conful having performed no worthy and memorable exploit, either in his is province Herreria, or in France (for thither he went also in the end) but only that he redeemed his father Cn. Servilim and his uncle C. Lastaim, from servitude and bondage, now fixteen years after they had been taken priloners by the Boil before the village Tanetum, returned to Rome, with with his father going on the one fide, and his uncle on the other: a man famous rather for his privat deeds, then renowned for any publick and honourable act worthy of remembrance. And a bill was preferred unto the people, that it should not be imputed for a trespasse unto Cn. Servia ling, that whiles his own father (who had fitten upon the ivory chair of cltate) was living (and that unknown to him) he had been both Tribune and Ædile also of the Commons against the laws in that behalf provided. This act being passed and granted, he returned again into his province. Unto Cn. Servilins the Conful who was in the Brutians countrey, there revolted Confinia, Uf. I fugum, Vaga, Bestaia, Hetricalum, Sphann, Argentanum, Dampesia, and many other peeces of small accompt, upon occasion that they saw the Carthaginians war to wax cold and feeble. The fame Conful fought a battell with Annibal in the teritory of Croton : the maner of which fight is darkly and obscurely reported. For Valerius Antias faith, there were flain five thousand of the enemies: a thing of such consequence, that either it was meer impudency to forge it, or great negligence to overflip it. But the turth is, from that time forward nothing was done by Annibal in Italystor to him also there came from Carthage Embaffadors to cal him home into Africk, even about the same time that the others did unto Mago. And as it is reported of him, all the while hat he gave audience to the Embassadors, be gnashed and grinded his teeth, he kept a sighing and groning, yes, and hardly could forbear to fined tears. After they had delivered their Meslage ac. K cording to their commission, Yea, mary, qd.he, now they go no more about the bu sh withme " by covert means and under hand to fend for me home, but openly are feen in the action : who all this while in infering no supplies either of men or money to be transported over unto me, sought to draw and hale me from hence. Well ther. It is not the people of Rome fo often by me defeat-" ted and put to flight, that hath by armes overcome Annibal, but it is the Senat of Carthage, with stheir backbiting and malicious envy. Neither will P. Scipio rejoyce fo much, and beare himself or proud upon this difgrace of my return, as Hanno will; who with the ruine and subversion of Car-"thage, hath overthrown our house and family, when by no other means he could effect it. Now Annibal, whose mind fore-gave him that such a thing would fall out, had prepared shipping aforehand. And therefore after he had fent away the multitude of fouldiers that were of small or no L fervice, into the towns of the Brutians countrey, under a colour and thew of garrifons for defence. which towns were but few, and the same rather held in by awe and fear, then abiding in obedience for love and loyalty, he took with him the whole strength and flour of his army, and crossed over into Africk. But before he went to lea, many of the Italian nation, who refuling to follow him into Africk, had taken for fat Augry the chappell of Iuno Lacinia, which never to that day had been violated and broken; not with finding the liberty of the place, he cruelly maffacred in the very temple. Seldome by report had ever any man been known to leave his native foil and countrey, and depart into exile with more neavy heart, then Annibal did when he went out of his enemies land. Oftentimes he looked back to the coalts of Italy, blaming both God and man, yea, curfing himfelf and his own life, for that he led not straightwaies upon his fresh victory at Canna, his foul, M diers embrued as they were with blood directly even to Rome. Scipio (quoth he) had the heart " to go to Carthage, who when he was Conful, had never feen in Italy the Carthaginian enemic: "and my felf, having flain at Thrasymenus and Canna 100000 armed men, have fitten fill about 66 Casilinum, Camer, and Nola, wearing and decaying in strength every day more then other. In this "manner he blamed himlelf, and complained of his hard hap and curfed fortune : and fo he was pulled out of the possession of staly that he held so long.

News came to Rome about one and the tame time, that both Mago and Annibal were departed and onward on their journey: The joy of which twofold gratulation was the less in two regards, both for that their own captains seemed to have either little courage or small force to stay them behind, and impeach them for going, considering they had expresse order from the Senat to todo. No as also because they at Rome were pensive and doubtful, what would be the siles and end of all, seeing the whole weight of the war to bear and rest upon the shoulders of one only Captainand

to accept with joy and thankfulnesse a benefit when it first cometh, they will be far short, and fail " much more to remember the same when once it is past, Hereupon they cryed out and called aloud with one voice from all parts of the Senat-houle to P. Aline the Pretor, for to propole the matter to the court there affembled and a decree was granted, that for five daies there should be folems processions and supplications in every church and chappell before the shrines of the gods and goddeffes: and greater beafts killed for facrifice to the number of 120. Now when Latins and the Embaffadors of Mafaniffa, had their dispatch and were dismissed, tidings were brought of the Carthaginian Embaffadours coming to the Senat to fue for pe-ce, were seen at Purcoli, and that from thence they would travail by land unto Rome. Whereupon it was thought good unto the Senat, that Lelim should be sent for again and called back, th.t he might be present, and at the hearing of the treating of peace. Q. Fulving Gillo a Lieutenant of Sessio had the conducting of the Carth girian Embaffadors to Rome: who being forbidden to fet foot within the City, were lodged without the in great hall named Villa Publica, and had audience given them of the Senat, affembled in the temple of Bellons. Who made in manner the very same ineech that they had before unto Scipio, cheering the whole State and their publick councell, and laying all the fault and blame upon Aunibal for m.king war : faying, that he had no warrant, commission, and commandment from the Senat to passe over the Alps, no, nor to much as over Iberus: and that of his own head he took arms; and watted not upon the Romans only, but also upon the Sagantins. In confideration whereof, he that would eftern all things aright, and weigh the truth indeed, null needs judg, that for any thing done by the Sen t and people of Caribage, the ancient league made with the people of Reme, bath continued to that day found and entire. And therefore nothing elie had they in commission to fine for and request, but that they might maintain and the Contai. Now when the Pretor, according to an ancient custome of their forefathers, had given liberty to whomsoever that would for to put interrogatories unto the Embassadors, and the elder fort, sinch as had been present at the making of the capitulations and covenants concerning the sind peace, and demanded of them, some one thing, and some another; and the Embassadors answered against hat by opening of their more than the capitulations and covenants concerning the sind peace, and the table you can sent the capitulations and covenants concerning the sind peace, and the table you capitulations and covenants concerning the sind peace are the state of the capitulations and the Embassadors answered against the things of the capitulations and the Embassadors answered against the state of the capitulations are the embassadors answered against the things and the capitulations are the state of the capitulations and the Embassadors answered against the state of the capitulations are the capitulations are the state of the capitulations and the capitulations are the state of the

ed again, that by occasion of their yong age (for they were all in manner but yong men) they remembed no such thing: the whole court from all parts thereof cryed out and said, that this was but a fraudulent and traiterous Carthaginian trick to chuse and send such for to sue for the old peace which they themselves could not not remember. And when the Embaisadors were voided out of the Senat house, and the opinions of the LL demanded, M. Livian was of this mind, that (no. Servilian the Consul, who was the neerer of the twain, should be sent for, that the treaty of peace might in his presence occonsisted upon. For since that there could not lightly a weightier matter then it was, come afore them to be determined of, he thought it stood not with the shoor and reputation of the people of Rome, that such a matter should be debated of without the personal

E presence of both, or at the least wise one of the Consuls. Que. Metallus (who three years before had been Consul and Dictator) spake to the cause in this manner. For as much as P. Scipio by defeating and putting to the sword whole armies, by wasting and spoiling the territories of the enemies, had driven them to this exigent, that in humble fort they came to crave peace: and considering that no man living was better able to judge with what mind and intent they fined for this peace then himself, who warted ever before the gates of Carthudy-therefore no mans advice was to be heard, but only his, either to accept of the said peace in question, or to reject it. M. Valeriand.

Lavings, who had been twice Consulyargued, that they were spies and not Embassadors, who now were come; and that it were a good deed to command them to avant and be packing out of the consines of said; & to send with them certain men of purpose to guard them to their ships;

pyea, &t o write unto Seipio to go forward with his wars & not to flack one jot. Latinu & Falvisus added moreover and faid, that Seipio laid this especially for his ground, to hope there might be peace, in cale Ansibal and Mago were not called out of Italy: As for the Carthaginians, they would make semblant of any thing whatfoever; so long as they expected those leaders and those atmiss; but afterwards without remembrance of covenants, were they never so fresh and new, yet, and without respect of all the gods, they would (no doubt) maintain and continue the wars. In these regards they enclined the rather to Lavisu, and approved his opinion. So the Embassadors were fent away without any peace obtained, or certain answer returned onto them.

Much about that time, Cn. Servitim the Conful, who made full reckoning that he should have the honour of bringing Italy into quietness, made pursuite atter Annibal, as it he had been couried & G divenout by him; and first failed over into Seily, and then into Airok. Which being commonly noticed and braited abroad at Rome, at the first the LL. of the Senat thought good, that the Pretor thould write unto the Confuls to this effect, that the Senat judged it meet and reason for him to return into Italy. But afterwards upon the Pretor his words, saying that the Conful would fet nought by his letters, P. Sulpitim was created of purpose Dickator, who by vertue of that more soverages rule and authority, called the Confull peremptorily home into Italy. And the rest that year, he together with M. Servilius the Generall of the horse, spent in progresse and vifiting all the Cities of Italy which in time of war had thaken off their alleageance, and in taking due knowledge of all their causes and reasons severally.

During the time of the truce, there let forth allo out of Sardinia from Lentulus the Pretor, an hundred hulks laden with victuals, together with a convoy and guard of twenty gallies of war, and passed over into Africk safe, both from the danger of the enemy, and also from the perill of tempells by fea. But Cn. Ollavim as he was in his voyage from Sicily, with a fleet of two hundred hulks and thirty frong gallies, had not the like good speed. For as he sailed (well near) within the kenning of Africk, first he was calmed; then the wind turning South, troubled and disordered his ships, yes, and scattered them over the sea one from another. Himself with his gallies of war wrought against the wind and the current, and with exceeding toil and labour of the oare-men, I doubled the point of the cape of Apollo, & there in the bay rode at anchor but the hulks for the most part fell with the lland Agimurus (which thutterhupon the foreland, and lieth in the very mouth of that creek from the fea wherein Carthage ftandeth) almost ten leagues from the City : and some were driven by wind to a place called the Hotmaters, over against the City. All this hapned within the fight of Carthage. And therefore out of all parts of the City, was great running to the market place. The magiltrats affembled the Senat; the people at the entry and porch of the Councell house, called upon the Senators and cryed out, that they should not let flip so great a boosy out of their eies and hands. Some alledged against them, the fidelity of treating of peace: others also objected the faithfull promise of truce (the terme whereof was not yet expired.) But at last when both. Senat and people were intermingled all in manner together, agreed it was by a general K consent, that Afarubal with a fleet of fifty fail, should cut over to Agimurus; and so from thence rally and gather together the Roman ships dispersed along the coasts and the havens. And the hulks (abandoned of their marriners that were fled, first from the lland Agimerus, and afterwards from the Hotmaters aforesaid) were drawn and towed as it were at the tails of their own thips to Carthage. As yet the Embaffadours were not returned from Rome, neither knew they what the resolution of the Roman Senat was concerning war or peace, nor the day of the truce determined. Scipio taking the wrong and indignity to be more hainous, in that the hope of peace and the affurance of truce should be violat by them first, who sought both for the one and the other; prefently dispatched an embassage to Carebage M. Bebins, L. Servilius, and L. Fabins; who being by the concourse and running together of the people, neer to a shrewd turn and milchief; and I. forefeeing their return like to be a dangerous, craved of the magistrats (who saved them from violence) to fend certain ships to waft them. So they were allowed two gallies called Triremes. which having conducted them until they were stived at the river Bagrada, where they were within fight of the Roman camp, returned back again to Carthage. Now the Carthaginian Armado lay in the rode before Vica. From thence there made out three gallies of four ranks of oars; whether it were upon some secret direction from Carthage so to do, or that Asambal the Admiral of the fleet, upon his own head adventured to foul an action (the flate having no hand therein, and therefore not to be blamed) and efpying the Roman Galley of five banks of oars past the point of the cape, fuddainly affailed her from the main fea. But neither could they invest and strike her with their beak heads, making so good way, and shifting so well by reason of her swiftness: neither M could the armed fouldiers from out of their lower vessels boord her, being so tall a ship over them. And right valiantly the defended her felf as long as that lasted ; which when it once failed, and that the had no other means to help her felf, but only the nearness of the land and a number of souldiers who from the camp were run to the shore, with the losse only of the ship all the passengers escaped safe to land.

Thus the truce being doubtless broken with one wickedness coming in the neck of another, Laline and Fulvine came in the very nick from Rome, together with the Carthaginian Embaffadors; unto whom Scipio; having given his word, that though the Carthaginians had not only broken the faith and affurance given of the truce, but also the law of arms, in abusing and evill intreating the persons of the Embassadors, yet himself would do nothing to them unworthy either the order of N the people of Rome, or unfitting his own maner and cultome, dismiffed the Embaffadors, and made preparation for war. When Annibal now approached the land of Africk, one of the mariners was commanded to climb up to the top of the mast to discover the coast, and to see what part they were directed to a and when he made answer and said, that the prow made head upon a place called, the Raines fepulebre; he missisked the omen and presage of that place, and commanded the pilot to passe by, and leave it : and to be put his fleet within the bay of Leptis, and there fet his army a thore. And these were the affairs of Africk for that year. The acts ensuing, reach to that year, wherein M. Servilius Geminus, who then was Generall of the horse; and T. Clandins Nere were made Confuls. But in the end of that former year, when the Embafiadors of the confederat Cities of Greece O made complaints, that their territories were walted by the Kings garrifons : and when they feat their Embassadors into Macedonia, for to demand satisfaction and restitution, they could not be admitted unto the King, nor have audience: and moreover, they gave intelligence, that there were four thousand armed souldiers transported over into Spain, under the conduct of Sopuse to aid the Carthaginians : and certain fummes of money likewife fent with them: the Senat gave order that Embassadours should be addressed unto the King; to give him to understand,

A that the LL, of the Senar took all this to be done against the tenure and form of the league. So there were lent C. Terentino Varro, On Manlins, and M. Aurelins. And three gallies of five course خي پير ۳۰ ata of cars they were allowed and the

This was a year of special note; for a great scare-fire, whereby the publick cliff was butter to after down to the premise : alfo for much abundance of rain and many flouds, and exceeding cheapoels of victual. For besides that all Baly was open by reason of general peace throughout. M. Kalenius Falco, and M. Fabius Bures, fidiles of the chair, divided the great flore of com that was lent, out of Spain, among the people; freet by firect, and fet the price at "four Affesthe Mo- "Three pence dius, The same year Q. Fabins Massimus departed this life; a man of great years and exceeding English, old, if that be true which some writers report, that he was Augur 42 years. But certain it is that he was a man worthy of to great and honourable a furname, yea, and if it had begun first it him-B jelf. He farpassed the dignities of his father; he was equal in honor to his grand-father: Rullus his grand-father, I must needs say, had more titles of victories, and of greater bartails; but one enemy of his, Annibal, may countervail them all, as many as they were. Howbeit, this man was counted more wary and advised, than hardy and forward; and as a man may well doubt whether by natural disposition he loved to take leisure in all his actions, or that it was a policy of his agreeable to the wars properly then in hand; to verily nothing is more certain than this, that as

This only man by wife delay, Reftor'd our ftate fall'n to decay.

His (on Q. Fabius Marcinus was invetted or installed Augur in his place, and for Bishop in his room (for two sacerdotal dignities he had) Ser, Sulpitius Gatha was chosen. The Roman plaies were exhibited one day, and the Plebeian Games thrice wholly renued by the Ediles M. Sextus Sabinus, and Cn. Tremellius Flaccus. They both, were made Pretors; and with them C. Livius Salinator, and C. Aurelius Cotta. The folempelection of the Magistrats for that year, whether Cn. Servilius the Conful held, or (because of important business in Tuscam, about the examinations of the conspiracies there of certain great men, by commission from the Senate, which might keep him there) P. Sulpicius, the Dictator by him nominated; it is uncertain, by reason of the variety and difference of writers in that behalf

In the beginning of the year next following, M. Servilius and T. Claudius, after they had affembled the Senat in the Capitol, moved concerning the Provinces. And for a fauch as both of them defired. Affrick, they were willing that Affrick and Italy, should be put to the choice of a Lortery. But by the especial travail of Q. Merelins, the Province of Affrick was neither granted nor denied to either of them. And the Confuls were commanded to deal with the Tribuns of the Commons, that if they thought so good, they would prefer a bill unto the people, to know whom they would have to war in Affrick. So all the tribes in general gave their voices with P. Scipio, Nevertheless, the Consuls (for so the Senat had decreed before) cast lots for the Province of Affrick. Thus Affrick beiell unto T. Claudius, namely, that he should fail over thither with an armado of fifty thips, all gallies of five ranks of oars, and be joyned in equal commission with Scipio, And M. Servilius had Hetruria allotted unto him. In the same Province Cn. Servilius also was to continue in government, in case it pleased the Senat to stay the Consul in the City. Of Pre-E tors, M. Seftius by lot had the rule of Gallia, with order, that P. Quimilius Varus should make over unto him the Province and two legions. And C. Livius took the charge of the Brutii with the two legions, which the year before were commanded by P. Sempronius the Vice-conful. Cn.

Tremelius was appointed to govern Sicily, and to receive of P. Villus Tappulus the Pretor of the former year, that Province and two legions. And ordered it was, that Villus as Propretor, should keep in obedience and defend the coast of Sieily with twenty thips of war, and a thousand souldiers; and that from thence M. Pomponius should in the twenty ships behind embark one thoufand and five hundred foundiers, and transport them over to Rome. Unto C. Aurelius Cotta was the civil jurisdiction of the City affigued. All the rest continued still in their government, and had F their commissions newly signed, according as they had either provinces or armies under their hand. And with fixteen legions and no more, was the State of Rome that year maintained. Now to the end they might begin all enterprises in the name of the Gods and proceed therein with their grace and favour, order was given, that the Confuls before they went out to war, should fer forth those games and plaies, and facrifice those greater beatts which T. Manlius Dictator, in the year that M. Claudius Murcellus, and T. Quintius were Confuls, promised by solemn vow, in case the Common-weal continued for five years following, in the same good estate as then it was, So the games were exhibited in the great Cirque or shew-place sour daies together, and the sacrifices flain accordingly, as they were vowed to the Gods.

"But all this while, as mens hope, to their fear also encreased daily more and more, whiles they "could not certainly resolve with themselves, whether they had more cause to rejoyce, that Ananidalater fixteen years had abandoned train, and left the possession thereoffree unto the peo-(pleof Rome; of to be afraid, for that he had passed over into Africk with the safety of his are a my. For why? the place was only changed, and the danger all one. And firrely Q. Fabius late deceated, no vain Prophet of so great a peril and hazard, was wont to foretel, and this was ever his fong: That Annibal would be a more dangerous enemy at home in his own country, than "he had been abroad in a forrain Land, And Scipio should find, that he had to deal neither with

Scipio should be sure to encounter and meet in battail those who with their own hands had flain Pretors, and killed Confuls of Rome; all bedight and goodly to be feen in mural and vallare coronets, for their good fervice in scaling of walls, and mounting over rampiers; those I say who at their pleasure have ranged through the won camps and forced Cities of the Romans. Neither at this day have the Magittrats of the people of Rome to many bundels of rods. with axes born before them, as Annibal hath taken from the Roman Generals whom he hath flain, & can if he lift shew and carry before him. Casting and tossing these doubts and sears in their mind, x they themselves encreased their own care, and doubled their dread in this point also, that whereas they were wont for certain years to make war in fight of home, in diverse and fundry places of Italy, with a lingring kind of hope, without regarding any iffue thereof like prefently to enfue now Scipio and Annibal, Captains matched together (as one would fay) to make a final end & tryal of al. had fet all mens minds awork to expect the event now or never. And even they also who had reposed exceeding confidence, and grounded no small hope of victory in Seipio, the more their spirits were amufed upon it, and deficous to fee a speedy effect, the greater was their care and doubt of the sequel. The Carthaginians for all the world were likewise affected and disquieted in mind. One whiles, beholding Annibal, and considering his noble and worthy acts, they repented that they fired for peace. Another while again, when they looked back and remembred, how twice L they had been defeated in battail, Syphan flain, themselves driven out of Spain, chased and hunted out of Italy, and all this by the valor and policy of one man Scipio; they trembled for fear of him. as if he were the fatal Captain born for their ruin and utter destruction.

Now by this time was Annibal, come as far as Adrumetum; from whence, after he had bestowed some sew dayes in refreshing his sea-sick souldiers, he was roused with searful poststhat brought news, how all about Carthage was full of enemies and hostility: whereupon he made long journies till he came to Zama. This Zama is a Town distant from Carehage five dayes journey, From thence he fent out espials, who being taken by the Roman warders, were brought before Scipio, and he caused them to be delivered unto the Tribuns or Marshals, with commandment that they should be led throughout the camp : and suffered without all fear to see whatso- M ever they defired. And when he had asked of them whether they had peruled and confidered every thing to their content, and enough to serve their turn; he sent them back again to Annibal, with a fafeconduct to accompany them. Annibal took no pleasure at all in hearing of any thing that they reported: for (among other particulars) they brought news that Malanissa chanced that very day to come thither with fixthouland foot and four thouland horse. But most of all, he was troubled and cast down with the resolut confidence and assurance of the enemy; which no doubt (he thought) arole nor of nothing. And therefore albeit himself was the only cause of that war, and by his arrival had disturbed the truce concluded, and the hope of peaceable covenants; yet supposing that a more indifferent accord might be obtained, in case he sued therefore while he was entire and unfoiled, rather than after he were vanquished and overcome; headdref- N ied a messenger or pursivant unto Scipio requesting that he might confer and commune with him. Whether he did this of his own accord, or by direction from the publick Councel of the State, I have no reason to set down or avouch for certain, either the one or the other. Valerius Amias writeth, That he was by Scipio defeated in the first battel, wherein were flain in field 1 2000 armed men, and 1700 taken priioners, whereupon himself in person came as Embassador, with other ten Orators into the camp unto Scipio. But howfoever it was, Scipio refused not to emparle; and fo, both Generals of purpose advanced forward and approached with their camps, to the end they might be neerer one to the other when they should meet in conference. Scipio made choice of a plot of ground not far from the City Nadagara: which as it was handsome and meet in other respects, so especially in this, that it had a watering place within an arrow shot, Annibal O took an hill four miles from thence, fure enough and commodious otherwise, but only that they were far from water. In the mid way between they chose a plain, open on every side, where they view of Stipie might discover and see all about them, that no ambush there were laid: and after they had cansed their armed fouldiers to retire a like distance from either party, then came together with one truch-man or interpreter apeece, not only the greatest and bravest Captains of their time, but also equal to the mightiest Kings or Emperors of realm or nation that ever had been afore them

Wherefore, if befides these points and applications, under which the peace at that time was like to be concluded (and, what those more you "know as well as I can tell you) you bring with you any recompence and amends for our things, "which being charged with victual and munition, you took perforce from us in time of the cents-"tion of armsias also for the outrage and violence committed upon the persons of our limballa-"dors; there is some reason that I should consider thereupon and be advised by my Council, But O "if you think hardly thereof allo, as being thereby too fore preffed; look for battel, you that could "not like of repose; provide for war, fince you would abide no peace. Thus without any conclusion of accord they left parling; & being fernaned to their own companies, they related unto them. how their conference came to nothing, and all their words were but wind, and did no good; and thereforethe martet was to be determined and tried by dint of (word, and they to trust to that fortune which the Gods had appointed for them, So foon as they were come into their camps, both of them made proclamation, that the fooddiers thould buckle them threat made ready their it-mour plack up their thinks, and address themselves to a dipaint an of the quarted, where it they then well, they were to be viscours nor for one day, but to ever and aver. For before the morfor the state of t to escape nor place of sale retteat, being in a strange and unknown land ; to Contage (having laid all upon this one cast) if they now missed, made accompt that all was gone, and pretent destruction ar hand. So the next day there advanted forward to this doubtful and dangerous tryal-two most B poble and renowned Captains, of two right mighty and puiffant states : two most valiant and hardy armies came forth into the field refolute that day either to win the fours or lole the addles to gain more glory to their former honour, or elie to lose all that ever they had gotten. Thus therefore between hope and fear their minds were perplexed and diltracted; and beholding one while their own forces, and another while their enemies power ; measuring rather by their eye, than weighing by reason their firength, they had at once presented unto them, objects of joy, and content, as well as of forrow and heavinels. And look what the foundiers themselves could not think upon, those things their leaders put them in mind of singgesting unto them by way of admonition and exhortation, what foever was thought expedient and good. Annibal rehear cd his noble acts archieved in Italy for the space of sixteen years, he reckoned up how many Roman Cabc tains he had flain, how many armies he had defeated and put to the fivord and ever as he met with any fouldiers of note and markfor fome worthy and memorable battail, he put them in remembrance of their honourable tervice and good deferts : Scipio related the conquest of Sp.:in, reconnted the fresh foughten fields in Affrick, alledged the very consession of the enemies; who neither for fear could do other but feek for peace, nor yet upon an inbred fallhood imprinted in their hearts, continue long in the same. Befides, he interred the communication and speech of Anaibal had with him in lecret and apart from others: which according as he was disposed to devise, he might turnat his pleasure to fit his purpole. And for affinich as the Gods had the wed unto them as they went out into the field the fame figus and tokens of birds, by direction whereof their fathers hefore them fought in times past before the llands Egatet; he offed and prelaged that the war h. was come to an end, all dangers and troubles overblown, that the ipoil and pillage of Carthage was at their devotion, and they at the point to return home unto their countrey, their parents, wives, children, and domestical Gods. And this he spake with such a losty gesture of his body, with to pleatant and lovely a countenance withal, that a man who had teen him, would have thought verily he had archieved the victory already. Then he embattailed first his Hastati (or spears) in the vanguard behind mem the Principes; and the rereward he guarded and fortified with the Triari). Neither marshalled he whole cohorts thrust thick and close together, in the head of the battail before their enligns, but divided them into Squadrons, diffant a prety way alunder one from the other: to the end there might be room and space to receive the Elephants of the egemies, that they should not break the arraies and ranks. As for Letius (whom he had emploied before as Elientenans, but that year in quality of a Questor by a special order and direction from the Senat, and not by choice of lot him with the Italian Cavalry he put in the left point and Mafaniff a with the Numidian horsemen in the right. The open waies and void spaces between the Sanadrons aforefaid, placed in the front before the enfigns, he filled with the Velites or Iavelotiers, who ar that time were light armed fouldiers; with this commandment, that presently upon the violent tharge given by the Elephants, they should either retire behind the files, or electunto a side, both on the right hand and the left and joyn cloic to the formost ranks, and make the Elephants way to run upon their that from the one fide and the other. Annihal to fifike a terrour into the enemies, first arranged the Elephants in the front, who were in number four, score, and more than ever he. had before in any hattail. Then he embartailed the aid-fouldiers of the Ligurians and Frenchmen p with the Baleate lingers and the Mores intermined among them. In the main battail he placed the Cathaginians and Affricans, with the legion of the Maccadonians: behind whom (leaving a little space between) he fet in array the battallon of the Italian fouldiers in the receward for succour: and those were most part of them Bruit; who followed him more perforce and by con-figure, than of any 2000 will, when he departed out of leafs. The Cayary allolic displaced and ned round like wings about the two points; whereof the Carthaginians kept the right, and the Namidians the left. Sundry and divers were the exhortations throughout the army, among to manymen; whole language was difforant, whole complexions far unlike, whole manners and conditions were divers who differed in laws and cultoms whole armours were not all one, whole raments and apparel not fittable, and finally, whole quartel and caule of war was not one and the G fame. The absultaties and aid-foul diers fed themselves with the hope of ready and prefent payment and wages for the time path, yea, and with a duple and triple argumentation thereof to boot, one of the food and millage. The Frenchmen upon a special barred of their own, and the same deeply sched, were soon kindled and embanded against the Romans. The Ligurians, who were hopepront of the rough and range womrams, and whole teeth watered at the fruitful and plen-fense fiedge of the rough and range womrams, and whole teeth watered at the fruitful and plen-fense fiedge of 141, was quickly by him moved to hope after victory. The Mores and Numidians he frighted with the groud and syrannical rule of Majanifa, under which they should ever after

live. Before the Carthaginians he presented the walls of their native City, their houses and house H Gods, the sepulchres and tombs of their ancestors, their children and parents, yea, and their rimorous and fearful wives: he fet before their eyes either final destruction of all those things and flavery of their persons, or else the empire and soveraign dominions of the whole world: and no meanbetween these extremities either offear or hope.

When as the General was most bufie thus in exhorting the Carthaginians and the Captains of the strangers, amongst the fouldiers of their own Nations, and that for the most part by means of interpreters, intermingled for the same purpose with them ; the 1 rumpets sounded, and the horns bew from the Roman hoft. And such a wonderful shout arose from thence, that the Elephants turned upon the Mores and Numidians of their own fide, especially in the left point of the battail. Whom M finiff a feeing once affrighted, he foon redoubled their fear; and riding upon I them with a hor charge, laid naked the battaillon of footmen on that tide, and clean without the aid of their Cavalry. Howbeit, tome few of the Elephants driven without fear full upon the enemy, made foul work among the ranks of the light armed Velites, and overthrew a number of them, not without many a wound and much hurt done to themselves. For the Velites leaping again nimply to the Squadrons, after they had made way for the beafts, fearing they should betroden underfoot by them, let flie their javelins at them from both fides, lying open as they did like buts to the shot on either hand. Neither lott they any time, who were in the vanguard before the Enfigns, nor gave over flinging their darts at them, until they were driven by a volley of thot lighting upon them from all parts, clean out of the Roman battail: and then they turned head also upon the very Horsemen of the Carthagini as in their own right point, and for- K ced them to run away. Lalins for his part, feeing the enemies in diarray and fore troubled. charged upon them with his Horles, and encrealed their fright. So as now the Carthaginian battaillon was disjurnished and stript of their Horsemen on both wings. By which time the Cavalry joyned battail, whose hope was now quailed and thrength abated, and therefore notable to make their parts good. Besides another thing there was, a small matter to speak of, but yet in fighting time and in the very conflict, of great confequence and importance, The shout and cry from the Romans was ever alike and confonant in all parts, and therefore the greater and more terrible; but the enemies made difforunt noties, according as they differed in language, being as they were, of many and fundry Nations. The manner of the Romans fight was fire and the diaft, by reason of the peife of their own bodies, and the weight of their armour, hearing L fill a. d preffing hard upon the enemies: but they on the other fide, shewed more swiftness and agility, than force and violence. And therefore at the very first shock the Romars in continently enfor ed their battaillon to retire and lose their ground. Afterward they fell to shouldering and knocking them with the pikes and boffes of their bucklers: which done, they fet foot forward a good round pace, and gained some ground of them, marching on still, and no man seemed to make head against them; whiles they that were hindmost in the files, perceiving once that battaillon to go on and win ground, still put forward the formost, which was the very thing that availed much, and was of great efficacy to put the enemies to flight. But the fecond battaillon which confilled of Africans, and Carthaginians, were so far from seconding and upholding the auxiliary strangers thus dismarching; that contrary-wise, for fear lest the Romans by M killing them in the forefront (who stood to it lustily and made resistance) should come as far as to them behind, they likewise retired and gave backward. Whereupon the aid-souldiers also suddainly shewed their hin-parts and turning their face upon their own fellows : some of them retired for refuge into the second battaillon; others fell to killing of them that would not receive them within their ranks : and good reason they had, for as a while before they had no helpat all of them, to then they were altogether excluded and thut out from them. So as now the Carthagini ans had to deal at once in two skirmishes shuffled together, whiles they were compelled to close and come to handlight, both with their enemies, and also with their own fellows. Yet notwithstanding for all they were either so affrighted, or so angry with them receive them they would not in no hand into their battaillon: but keeping their ranks and files close together, they cast them to N fide to the wings and the void ground without the place of conflict, and all because they would not intermingle any fouldiers thus scared upon running away and many wounds, with that battaillon which flood fill fure enough, and as yet unfoiled. But the place where a little before the auxiliaries were ranged, was so sull of slain bodies, and weapons and armour thrumbled one upon another that the Romans had welneer more ado to pass that way now, than they should have had through the preis of the enemies standing thick together. And therefore the formost of the Hastati following after the enemies, every one as well as he could over the heaps of bodies and armour on the earth, and through the flippery filth of the blond, made a pelmell of their own enfigns, and confusion of their ranks. Whereupon the entigns also of the Principes beganto wave; when they saw the battail afore them so wandering and inconstant. Which Scipie, when he o once perceived commanded in all hast to sound the retreat unto the Hastati: and when he had withd awn as many of them as were wounded and hurt, and bestowed them in the rereward he brought the Principes and the Friariito the out-wings and flanks thereof; to the end, that the middle battaillon of the Haftati should be more fure and strong, By this means thete began a new skirmish. For now were they come to their very enemies indeed; such as for armour and weapons of all forts, for practife and experience of warfare, for fame and renown of worthy exploits, and last of all for greatness either of hope or peril, were could and comparable unto them. But both in number and also in courage, the Romans were superiour, for that already they had discomfited the Cavalry, put to flight the Elephants, beaten back the vanguard, and were ready now to encounter with the main battail, Now Lalini and Mafaniffa having had the horsemen in chase a good way, whom they had compelled to flie as is beforefaid, returned in good time and charged hotly upon the tail of the enemies battail. And this affault of theirs it was that fruck the froke, this did the deed and amazed the enemies. Many of them were environed and Annihal defeakilled in the place, many fled and were scattered over the plains and open fields, and by the horse- ted by Scipio. men who had taken up all the avenues, and ranged all about, were caught up here and there, and to flain. Of Carthaginians and their Allies, were killed that day above twenty thousand, and R welneer as many taken prisoners: of military enfigns there were gotten a hundred thirty three and eleven Elephants besides, alive. Of the conquerors there died about two thousand, Annibal with fome few horsemen made shift to escape out of the tumult and heat of the execution, and fled to * Adrumentum, having affaied and tried all means possible, both in the very conflict, and also before the battail, ere he departed and left the fight. And this praife and commendation he won turn, now Maeven by the confession of Scepio himself, and all others that were expert warriors, that with singu-chometra, aclar skill that day he ordered the battel, and marshalled the field. For the Elephants he had placed cording to in the forefront, whole adventurous force and intollerable violence in giving the onlet, might Mercaior. empeach the Romans from following their colours, and keeping their arraies; the only thing wherein they reposed their greatest hope and confidence. Then, before the main battail of the C Carthaginians, he fet the auxiliaries and aid-fouldiers, of purpose, that being a consuled rable and medley of all forts of nations, such as were not bound by alleageance, but tied only by gain and wages, should have no liberty to retire themselves, and escape by running away: who also, as the forlornhope, bearing the furious heat of the first brunt, might weary the enemies with charging upon them, and it they did no other good, yet with receiving many a wound in their bodies dull and turn the edge of the enemies fword. After this, in the battel, where all his hope was he placed the Carthaginian and African fouldiers; that being otherwise in all things else equal to the enemies, they might in this regard have the ods, in that they were to fight with them we ried and wounded, when they themselves were in heart and lusty. As for the Italians, who also were divided from the rest by a good space between, he removed far off into the rereward, as doubtful whether they were friends or enemies. Annibal having done this doughty deed and work, as it were D for the last proof of his vertue and valour, fled to Adrumetum, and was from thence sent for to Caribage: whither he returned in the, 36 year, after that he first departed thence a very child. Where in the Councel house he consessed and said, "That overcome he was not only in a battel "once but also in the main war for ever hereafter: protesting in plain terms, that now there was "no other way but one to fave themselves, and that was peace, if they could obtain it.

Scipio immediatly after this battail, having forced by affault and rifled the enemies camp, returned with a huge booty to the Sea and his ships, being advertised afore by a messenger that P. Lentulus was arrived at Urica with five thips of war, and a hundred Hulks laden with provision of all kinds of victual. And supposing it good policy now that Carthage was troubled and E throughly affrighted, to come upon them with all terrour on every fide : fo foon as he had difparched Laline away to Rome, with tidings of this victory, he commanded Cn. Oftavius to lead the legions by Land against Carthage. Himself in proper person, after he had joined this new fleet of Lentulus, unto the old Armado of his own, weighed anchor and departed from Utica, and failed directly to the Haven of Carthage. He was not far from thence, when there met him a ship of the Carthaginians, garnished with infules, ribbands, and white flags of peace, and beset with branches of Olive; wherein were ten Orators embarked, the best men of the City, sent by the advice and motion of Annibal to crave peace. Who as they approached the hin-deck and poop of the Admiral ship, put forth the vails and tokens of suppliants, praying and beleeching the protection and mercy of Scipio. Who had no other answer made them, but that they should repair p to Tunes, whither he intended to remove. Then himself after he had well viewed the situation of Carthage, not so much to have the full knowledge thereof at this present, as to terrifie the enemies, returned to Utica, whither he had called back Offavius also. As he marched forward from thenge toward Tunes, he had intelligence given him, that Vermina the son of Syphan was coming to aid the Carthaginians with a power of more Horsemen than Footmen: whereupon, part of the army together with the whole Cavalry was sent: whereof the light horse and van-curriers charging the vanguard in their march, after a light skirmish discomfitted the Numidians : and having stopped all passages every way with the Horsomen, so as they could not get out and flie, there were upon a fifteen thousand men of them slain, 1200 taken prisoners, 1500 Numidian Horses also were gotten from them alive, and 72 military ensigns. The young Prince himself in the G mids of the sumult and conflict, with some sew elcaped. Then encamped Scipio neer Tunes, in the fame place where he lay before: and thither repaired unto him thirty Embassadors from Carthage. And they verily, as they were in harder case and greater distress, made much more pitiful entreating than before; but in their audience found less favour and mercy by a great deal for their late treachery and falshood so fresh in remembrance. Now albeit when they were ser in counsel, all of them had just cause to be angry, and thereupon were provoked to destroy & rase Carthage:

yet upon better advisement and consideration, how great and difficult and enterprise, and what a long peece of fervice it was to beflege a City fo flrong and fo well fornified: and for that String M. himles was troubled in mind with the expectation of a flictation, who finally come to whithe credit and honor of finishing the war, which indeed was gotten by the travail and hanard figure ther all their hearts were turned and enclaned to peace. The morrow after the Orators were call led again before them; and after they had been well checked, rebuked, and plainly sold of the treachery, and warned withal, that after fo many loffes and overthrows, which they had received they should now learn to be wife, and at length believe that there were Gods in Heaven, and ther an oath was to be regarded, these conditions of peace were tendered and offered unto them Imprimis, it was capitulated, That they might live free, according to the form of their own Laws: Item. What Cities, what territories (and within what bounds and limits) they held and were posfessed of before the war began, the same they might keep still. Item, That Scipio and the Romans I from that day forward should not wast and spoil the countrey. Item, That the Carthagining should deliver all renegate traitors, all fugitive persons, all captives and prisoners, yea, and reeld unto them all thips of war with brafen heads, above ten triremes or gallies of three ranks of oars. Item. That they should put into their hands all those Elephants which they had already ramed and manned and should break and rame no more of them. Item, They should make war neither in Affrick, nor without Affrick, but by order and warrant from the people of Rome. That they should make restitution and amends to Masaniff a for all harms, and enter into league with him. Item, That they should find corn and money for the maintenance of the aid-fouldiers, until their Embassadors were returned from Rome : yea, and tender payment of ten thousand talents of filver by even portions in fifty years, Item, That they should put in a hundred hostages at the K pleasure of Scipio and none of them to be either under fourteen years of age, or above thirty Last of all, they would grant a truce upon this condition, That the ships which were taken during the time of the former cellation of arms, should be restored back again, with all things else that were therein: otherwise no truce for the present, nor hope of peace hereafter. These articles and conditions the Embassadors were willed to return home withal. Which after they had related in the general affembly of the people, Gifgo mounted up the pulpit to diffwade peace, and had audience given him with great applause of the multitude; who as they were heartless and unmeet for war. to they were as peevish and unruly and could not long continue in repose. Hereat, Annibal took great indignation, and was highly displeased, that in such a time, those things should either be delivered or heard; and he made no moreado, but stepped to Gifes, laid hand upon him and pul- L led him down from the pue out of which he spake: whereat the people were moved and grumbled in great discontent to tee fo strange a fight and unusual, in a free City. Then Annibat as he was a meer martial man and could not skill of civil affairs, nor well away with these citizens liberty. "I went, quoth he from you when I was but nine years old, and now after 26 years I am " come again. All military skill and knowledge, which fortune fometime in my privatematters, "and other whiles in publick affairs, hath taught me from my childhood, me thinks I havelearn-" ed infliciently : mary for the rights and priviledges for the laws, customes and fashions of the "Ciry and the common Hall I must be informed and instructed by you. Thus having pleaded ignorance for his excuse, he discoursed at large of peace, arguing how reasonable and equal, year and how necessary it was. The greatest point of difficulty in all the capitulations ministred unto them M was this, That touching the things above faid which were taken during the abilinence of arms, there was nothing now forth-coming and to be seen but the bare vessels, and no easy matter was it to feek up the reft. Now when as they that gain aid the peace were convinced and put down by reason, agreed it was, that the ships should be redelivered, and the men likewise be soreht out and found: as for all the reft that was wanting, there found an estimate be made according to the value, at the diferetion of Scipio, and to the Carthaginians to make all good in money Writers there be that have delivered. how Annibal presently from the field fped him to Set and these finding a ship ready prepared for him, streight-wayes embarked, and went directly to King Antiochus: Alfo, when Scipio demanded above all other things that Annibal should be yeelded into his hands, answer was made, that Annibal was not in Affrick. After that the Embaffa-N dors were returned to Scipio, the Questors or Treasurers were commanded to draw an extractaccording to their books upon record, of all fuch things as were in the ships, and appertuned to the City: and look what belonged to private persons, the owners thereof were willed to derlare and reflify. In confideration and recompense whereof, there was s sum of money set flowns amounting to 25000 pound weight of filver, and the same to be paid presently out of hand by the Carthaginians. Thus a truce was granted to them for three moneths : with this clause appeared over and besides. That during the said rerm they should send their Embassadorsto no other placebut only to Rome: and what Embaffadors foever came to Carthage, they should not let them depart before they had certified the Roman General both who they were and what their medage and errand was. Then with the Carthaginian Emhaffadors were fent to Rome, L. Veturing Philo. O M. Martius Ralla, and L. Scipio, brother to the General, At that time there came such flore of grain and victuals out of Sicils and Sardinia, and thereby com was to cheap, that the Merchant was fain to leave corn behind him to fatisfie the fripmen and marripers for the portage and carriage there of.

Now there had been much trouble and fear at Rome upon the first news and alarm that the Carthaginians had taken arms again : and T. Clardins had commission to conduct a fleet with all

A fpeed into Sicily, and from thence to pale over into Affrick : likewife the other Conful was commanded to flay fill at Rome, until it were certainly known in what terms all matters flood in Manuot to usynmen nowe, and but flowly so work either in preparing and rigging an armado, or in putting it to fea; because the LL, of the Senat were of opinion, that as touching the peace and the conditions thereof, it was rather at the disposition of Seigns than of the Conful. Moreover, there were certain prodigious figns reported even presently before the very rumour of the forefaid rifing and infurrection, which caused man to sear greatly. At Camer, the circle and compass of the fun appeared less and it rained a good shower of stones. Also in the territory of Velive, the earth fetled and funk, and made huge hollow chinks, in fo much as trees were quite swallowed up under the ground. At Aricia the market-place and the shops all about, likewicat Frusing the B wall of the City in divers places, yea, and the gate, were finiten with lightning from heaven : and inmount Palatine it rained ftones. This wondrous fight laft rehearded, was expiate after the ancient custome, by keeping a Novendial sacrifice and seast for nine dayes; the rest by killing of greater facrifices. Among all, there were unufual deluges and inundations of waters, which troubled the minds and confciences of men; for the Tyber to iwelled and role to high, that by reason that the shew-place of the Circus was overflown, preparation was made for the letting forth of the games Apollinares, without the gate Collina, neer the chappel of Venus Ergeina. But upon the very day when the plaies should be exhibited, it grew to be so fair weather of a suddain, that the pageant and pompous train of the shew, which was a going to the gate Collina, was called back and pageant and pomposes and word brought, that the water was fallen and gone clean out from

C thence fo the people were more joyous, and the passimes celebrated with greater resort for that the usual and ordinary place served again for the solemnity to be performed, Claudius the Conful at last departed from the City of Rome, and went to Sea; where between the havens of Coffa and Lauretum, he was overtaken with a terrible and fearful tempest that arose havers or cops and Lawrenson, he was overlands while a terrible and learning time a rolle and put him in exceeding fear. From thence hecame to the Populonis, and there finied until the tempest was overblown and gone. D ingmuch toffed and torn, arrived at length at Corefees where, whiles the ships were drawn up into the dock to drie Land, and there a repairing, the winter came upon them, and the year turned about. And fo T. Claudius (as a private person, by reasons that no man renewed his commitnot for a farther time); brought the Armado back to Rome: But M. Oftentimes went the writs out for piblishing of the election, but by reason of tempetis it held not, nor was performed. And therefore when the old Magistras lear their office after the ides of March, and no new fublitured in their room, the City was clean without any Magistras of flate to fit in the prors chair. In Manisur Torquatus a Bishop, that year E died, In his place was invested C. Sulpities Gables. The Roman games were thrice exhibited and the March and C. Fabrius, Medics of the chair. The Clarks and Scribes belonging to the Ediles, together with their beadles and summoners, were detected for carrying forth certain money out of the restings and chamber of the City, and being these of considerations.

And therefore he protested plainly, that he would fuffer nothing to pass before that the Province of Affrick were affigned to him. His colleague (a lober, temperate, and discreet man) gave his consents for he saw full well, that as the contending for that glory with Scipio, was unjust and unreasonable, so in it he would be overmaiched, and never able to import and carry it away from him. Q. Mikania Ther. F offic and M. Acillas Glabrio, two Tribuns of the commons, gave out and fald, That Ch. For when by warrant from the Senat a bill was proposed unto the people. whom their pleislire was to nominate for government of Affrick, all the 35 Tribes gave their voices and awarded that Province to P. Scipio, Much contention there passed and many bickerments both in Senat-house and before the people, in the debating of this question: But in the end they grew to this point, to refer all to the judgment of the Senat. So the LL, of the Senat having taken their oath (for so it was agreed upon) thus concluded and gave this order. First, that the two Confuls flibild eiffier agree together between themselves, or else cast lots for their Provinces; namely, which of them should have the rule of Italy, and who the charge of a fleet of fifty K fail. A To their points M. Farmateur of purpole from Aurelius out of Macedonies made answer briefto the prome of the far Assistant to was left behind, for fear that the affociats of the people of 19 in this question with rodes and incumions into their territories and other injurious opprefitions, might ret elevate white the King rever departed out of the confins of the affociats aforelaid, and en-deavoured entry that those fobbers and foreigness of the country should not invade and over-run secayourse comy and the last away without any tiarm. As for Separer, he was a flate and peer of the their isheds and go cicar away without any narm. As for copater, ne was a frate and peer of the ready; and one neerly allied unto the King who lately was lent into Affrick with four thousand Maccdowidias and with inoperior and affith Annied and the Carthaginians. When as the Macedowidias being required what they could say to their challenges, framed but a doubtful and inticere defence, before they had well made an end they received this for their answer: That fince the Mine Khight war, if he proceeded and went on fifth the thouse though north years his hands full but foraling to be had broken the league in two points, first in offering wrong to the allies of the people of Rome, and moletting them by way of war and hoftifity; and fecondly, in helping their enepie of company in incidence of the property of Rome, and were taken captave; bur also M. Aurelius performed good service to the State, and a great pleafure to the Senat, in defending the Allies of the people of Reme by force of arms, when by right of league he could not. When the Macedonians had their dipatch, and were fent away with this heavy answer, then the Carthaginian Embassadors were called in.

When they beheld their reverent age, and the dignity of their personage (for they were the C best and principal men simply of their City) then every man was fully perswaded for his own part bert and principal nutral mings, which could be a supported by the description of the des mong his citizens furnamed Hadus, a man that ever perswaded peace, & opposed himself against Hadus in the the Barchine faction: And therefore he had the more credit and authority, when he derived Senat of Rome. the parame faction; Ann. uncerore neman the more creat and authority, when he derived the blame from the Common weal, and laid all the fault upon the wilhilness and greedy available from the wilhilness of the excusing and clearing the crimes; affording while confessing fomethings objected, left if they had denied certain miths, they should with more difficulty have obtained pardon and peace: now and then "alfogiving the LL, of the Senat an admonition and warning by the way, to use their prosperity "and good fortune modefully and with moderation, he added moreover and faid, That if the Car-D and good fortune moderty and with moderation and had been fo wife as to have taken their time and the opportunity when it was they should themselves have given those conditions of the compare and wish both at " peace, which now they are constrained to crave. But for men to be fortunate and wife both at "once it is arare and special gift, and seldome seen. And here it is that the people of Rome (quoth "he) is invincible, because in prosperity they can remember to be wise, and to take the best way of themselves. And certainly, a wonder it were, if ever they should do otherwise. For those commonly who happen to meet with fome new good fuccels, and have not been used thereto " before overfhoot and pass themselves too much in excessive joy, which they have not the grace "togovern with sobriety and discretion: whereas the people of Rome have ever been accusto-"medito the continual felicity of joyons victories, infomuch as they are grown into a difuse of

E «taking pleasure and delight in them? (io common they are) and have encreased their dominion "and Empire, more (in manner) by sparing and pardoning those whom they have conquerted, "than by the very conquest of them indeed.

"The speech that the other Embassiadors made, was more pitiful and lamentable, whiles they recounted before the Senat from what high effate, and to how base condition they were fallen: who but while fince held by force of arms, as it were the wholeworld, & had nothing left them "now but the bare walls of the City of Cathage, within which they were that up, and could fee « nothing either by land of fea, which they might rightfully claim as their own. Nay, the very "City's lelf and their houses, they were to enjoy no longer than the people of Rome is willing, and fotbeareth to proceed by rigour and extremity against the same, since there is nothing else to behind to work upon Now when as the LL of the Senar feemed to encline to mercy and compaffion one Senator there was amongst them (by report) who upon a deep and inveterate hatred of the Carthaginians trechery, spake out aloud and said, of What Gods will they regard and swear by, in inaking of a new league, who have broken their oath, and taken their name in vain whom "they called to witness in the former? Mary (qd. Afarabat) even those and no other that are so fharp revengers and heavy enemies to the breakers of league and covenant. So when all their minds were enclined to peace, Cn. Lemulus the Conful, who had the government of the navy, oppoled himself against the decree of the Senat for to crois the same. Then M. Attilium, and Q. Mimeint. Tribins of the Commons, preferred a folemn bill unto the people, in this form: Plea-G sech inyou, and will you grant, That the Senat shall resolve and determine, that peace may be concluded with the Carthaginians? Pleaseth it you to chile and appoint who shall be the man to make that peace; and who shall bring the army out of Africk? As concerning peace, thetribes every one as they were demanded their voices, granted affirmatively (Mis rogatic) that Scopio should some bade it, and also bring away the army. By verine of this Act passed by the people, the Senat made a decree, that P. Scipio by the advice and counsel of ten Commissioners, should contraft an accord with the people of Carthage, under what conditions he thought good. After this the Carthaginians rendred thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter H the Carchaginians tendred thanks to the LL. of the Senate, and requested that they might enter I into the City, and talk with their fellow citizens and country-men, who had been taken captives aforetime; and lay in the common goal and prition. For there were amongs them some or their kinsfolk and friends, noblemen of him and of good quality; others also, more whom sery, were to deliver forme mediage and credence from their kinimen. When they had hopen and bomauned with them, they came with a new persion and made, carnest finite, to give them lesses, strandome and redeem as many of them as they would; where upon they, were willed to give them their names and when they had named tak upon two hundred an order, angar muscl our attack Senat, whether the control of t names; and when they had named the update over with them into Affrick, unto Scipios wo, hundred of those captives whom the Carthaginians would make choice of; and declare unto him from the Senate, that in case the peace were fully agreed upon and finished, he thousand deliver r those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely mithous, paying any sasiame. Now wheather those two hundred to the Carthaginians, freely mithous, paying any sasiame. Now wheather hetalds of arms were appointed to go into affrick, for to, confirm and glablish the peace according ding to the folemn order at their own request there passed an act of the Senat framed in this form and tenor. Imprimis, That they should carry with them every one by himself, certain flint stones of their own, and likewise Verven. Item, That the Roman Pretors thould command them tolemily to pronounce the league, and then they to ask of the Pretor facted herbs or Verven. A kind of grals of herb this is, which was wont to be gathered from off the Capitol hill, and given to the Heralds.

Thus were the Carthaginians dismitted and tent from Rome: who being come into Africk to Scipio, concluded peace with the same capitulations as is abovefaid. And so they delivered up K their gallies and thips of war, their Elephants, the renegate traitors, the vagrant fugitives and four thouland priloners. Among whom was Q. Terenius Chello, a Senator by his calling. As for the thips, to loon as they were lanched forth into the deep, Scipio called them to be fer on fire and burnt. Some report that they were five hundred in pumber one with another, of every fort, and all directed and guided by oars. Presently were they set a burning: a dolorous fight, and heavy spectacle (no doubt) to the Carthaginians for to behold, as if Carthageit self had been on a light fire. The renegat traitors and rebels were punished more grievoully than the fugitives. As many of them as were of the Latin Nation loft their heads; all that were natural Romans, were crucior them as were or the Laun Nation logitueer neads. At that were natural Komans, were crucified and goundly unfied up on the gallows. Forty years before was the peace last made with the Carthaginass, when Q. Luttatius and A. Mantigs were Confols. The war began three and I twenty years after, whiles P. Cornelius, and T. Sempronius, were Confols. And the tame ended in the eighteenth year after, P. Cornelius, and P. Edina Petal being Confols. Many actines after Scipio by report, would lay that the wellful and coverous define of T. Claudius first, and afterwards of Cn. Cornelius, was the only stay and let, that this war epded not with the final ruin and uncertainty of Conformation.

destruction of Carthage. When as the Carthaginians, who by long and communal wars were grown bare & poor thought the levy and contribution of money for to furnish out the first payment, lay heavy and fore upon them, infomuch as in their Senat-hopie, there was great forrow and heaviness, yea, and piteous weeping; it is faid, that Annibal was feen to laugh a good while. And when A. Hedrerebukedhim for laughing in that publick lamentation of the City, confidering that himself was the canle of M those rears, "If (qd. Annibal) as we see by our eye the outward disposition of the sace and coun-"renance, so we could look within & behold the affection of the mind, ye might soon perceive. that this laughter of mine, which ye so much blame, proceedeth not from an heart that is glad " and joyful, but rather fenseless, supplied, and assonied with the exceeding griefs and calamities "that have hapned. Yet is not it so unseasonable and impertinent to our present condition, as "these tears of yours, and weeping that you make, is absurd and nothing to the purpose. Then " should ye have wept and shed tears, when our armor and weapons were taken from, us, when "our ships were set on fire, when we were interdicted and forbidden to make war with forrain "nations: for then had we our deadly blow, then our backs and hearts were broken. And never "think that the Romans have proceeded hardly against you, in comparison of the hatred that ye N " bare one to another. No great City and mighty State can long continue and rest in quier. If it " have no enemies abroad it findeth tome at home: much like unto ftrong and lufty bodies, which " feeming fure enough against all outward accidents and causes of fickness, are overcharged with " their own ftrength and fulness of humours, and thereby subject to most deadly maladies. So "much, forfooth, and no more we feel of the publick miseries & common calamities, as toucheth "and concerneth our felves in particular: wherein nothing pincheth us more, nor goeth neerer "to the quick, than to forgo our mony, and part with our pence. And therefore when Carthage "was conquered and despoiled of all her ancient honors, when ye saw her disarmed and ftripped " naked, when ye law her forlorn of all the armed nations of Affrick; no man then fighed, no man " groned thereat: but now when the tribute imposed, is to be paid out of your privat puries, ye o "keep a weeping and wailing, as in some publick suneral and mortuary carried forth, But alas, I "fear me greatly that ere it be long, ye shall find and feel, That your weeping this day hath been

" for the least loss of all the rest. Thus spake Annibal to the Carthaginians. Scipio having affembled his whole armytogether before them all reftored Masanifa to histathers Kingdom: and over and besides, endued him with the possession of the City Cirche, and other Towns and territories which belonged to the realm of Syptax; and were now in subjection A to the people of Rome, Unto Cn.Off avisus he gave order to conduct the fleet into Sicilyand there to make it over to Cn. Cornelson the Conful. The Carthaginian Embassadors he willed to go to Rome, that those acts and capitulations which were concluded by him with the advice of the ren Commissioners, might likewise pais under the approbation of the Senat, and the consent of the people, and so be ratified and confirmed for ever

Thus Scipio having obtained peace both by sea and land, and embatked his army, failed toward Siedy,& arrived at Lilybanm, From whence he fent away a great part of his army by fea, and himself passed by land through Isaly, which now was joyfull as well for the peace concluded as the victory atchieved. Where all the way as he went, not only the people came forth in multitudes out of the Cities to do him honour, but numbers also of the country peasants out of the Villages, filled B all the high-waies along untill he came to Rome: where he entred the City, riding in the moth Rately and magnificent triumph that ever had been. He brought into the City Chamber 100033 pound weight of filver. He divided among his fouldiers out of the poil four hundred Aties a Ocass forme peece. Syphax by his death rather disappointed the people of a goodly shew and pageant in the think 40. peece. Syphax by his death rather disappointed the people of a goodly linew and pageant in the triumph, than diminished any whit the glory of the triumpher: he died at Tybar not long afore, to which core the to the died. which place he had been removed from Alba: howbeit his death was not obliture, by reason that English, he was folemnly carried to his buriall, with the pomp of a publike funerall at the charges of the City, But Polybing a writer of good account, reporteth, That this King was led in the very triumph. As Scopio rode triumphant Q. Terentius Culleo followed after with a cap of liberty fet upon his head; and ever after, to long as he lived, he honoured him (as befeeming it was) and acknowledged C him the author of his freedom. But as concerning his furname Africanus, I cannot for certain learn, whether it were the favour of his fouldiers first, or the affectionate love of the people afterwards that brought it up, or rather began upon some of his own house and linage that courted and flattered him therewith: like as in our fathers daies Sulla was furnamed * Falix, and Pompeius, * Happy. * Magnus. This is certain that he was the first General that ever took his name of the country "Great. and nation by himself subdued, and thereby was renowned. But by his example afterwards, others nothing comparable to him in victory and conquest won goodly titles and glorious inscriptions think and confider, how threefcore years and three (for so many are reckoned from the first H Punick war, to the end of the second) have taken up no sewer books of mine than sour hundred eighty eight years before, even from the soundation of Rome unto the Confulship of that Appine Clandius, who was the first that warred upon the Carthaginians; methinks I foresce already, that like as they who being once entred into the shallows near the shore, are trained on still, and venture to wade into the sea, even so I, the farther I go forward, the deeper I step, and am carried away in a vast Ocean, and bottomless gulph (as it were which cannot be sounded; and that my work groweth still upon me in my hands, which as I went away apaste, and rid matters at the first, I would have thought by this time should have decreased

The Carthaginian peace was no fooner concluded, but the Macedonian war straightwaies en. I fued: nothing comparable to the Punick, if ye regard the hazard and danger, the vertue of the Captains for direction, or prowess of the souldiers : but if a man consider the Nobility and reputation of the ancient Kings, the fame and antiquity of the nation, the greatness of their seignory and dominion, who in times past had conquered and held by the sword much in Europe, and the better part of Alia, I dare well fay, as noble and renowned, if not more, But the war commenced against Philipten years almost before, had ere three years end been laid down and discontinued by means of the Ætolians: who as they gave occasion to enter into arms, so they wrought a composition of peace. But afterwards in process of time, when the Romans by reason of peace with the Carthaginians, had nothing to do, and were at leilure; and yet bearing an inward grudge, and owing a displeasure to Philip, as well for his faithless peace with the Ætolians and other allies and con-K federates of that country, as also for aid both of men and money lately fent into Affrick to Annibal and the Carthaginians behold, the Athenians, whose territories he had clean wasted and spoiled, and whom he had driven within their City walls, importuned them with their prayers, and perswaded them to take arms and renew the war aforesaid. And much about the same time there arrived Embassadors from King Attalus, as also from the Rhodians, giving notice that divers Cities and States of Asia were follicited likewise by Philip to band against the Romans. These Embaffadors had their dispatch, and received this answer. That the Senat would have a carefull eveto the affairs of Asia. But the entire treaty and consultation concerning the Macedonian war was wholly referred and referred unto the Confuls, who then were employed in the war with the Poit. In the mean featon three Embaffadors were addressed unto Protomess the King of Agypt, to L. wit, C. Claudius Nero, M. Amilius Lepidin; and P. Sempronius Tuditanus, with this commission: First to signifie and let him understand, that Annibal & the Carthaginians were subdued: secondly, to give thanks unto the King for continuing to tast and tasthinll unto the Romans in their dilites, and advertity, when other of their allies, and even their neighbours for look and abandoned them: last of all, to request him, that in case they should be forced by wrongs and injuries offered, to wage war against Philip, he would vouchfate the same mind still and his wonted affectionate favour toward the people of Rome.

Near about this time, P. Elius the Conful being in France, advertised that the Boians before his coming had made rodes into the lands of the friends and allies of the Romans, prefently it all haste levied and enrolled two legions upon the rumour of this tumult and trouble; and joyning M thereunto four cohorts of footmen out of his own army, fent C. Appinea Colonellor Captain of the Confederates, with this power so suddenly raised, and with commandment to march through that part of Umbria, which is called, the Tribe Sappinia, and to invade the territories of the Boil. whiles himself in personled his forces the open way traversing through the mountains, and came thisher. Appins being entred into the confines of the enemies, at the first had a good hand, and sped well in forraging the country with safety of himself. But afterwards, having made choice of a meet place near unto a Castle called * Mutilum, for to cut down and reap the corn, for now the fields were ready for harvest) but yet, without espials sent out to discover the coasts about without fetting (trong and fufficient guards, which being well appointed and armed, migha deten the unarmed that were buffe in their harvest work; he chanced himself and all his forragers and N reapers to be surprised at unawares by the Frenchmen, and assailed on every side. Whereupon they also that were armed fled in great fright; and 7000 menthragling here and there overthe com fields were flain; and among them C. Appins himself their leader. The rest for fear were driven to put themselves within their Camp : from whence without direction and guidance of any certain Captain and only upon a generall consent of the souldiers, the night next following they abandoned their hold, left much of their baggage behind them, and through blind forrests, chases and wild mountains (in manner unpaffable) they came in the end to the Conful : who, atterne had performed in his Province no memorable act, lave only that he wasted the borders and trouters of the Bois, andim de a league with the Ingauni (a nation of the Ligurians) returned to Rome. So foon as he had affembled the Senat, all the whole house with one voice called upon him, to treat o and consult upon no other matter before they had determined on King Philip and the complaints made by their allies: so he proposed that out of hand to be debated in Councill. And the Senate in a frequent number there met, paffed a decree, that P. . Elius the Copiul should fend whom he thought good with commission and authority for to receive the Armado, which the saw was to bring out of Sicily, and therewith to cross over into Macadamia. So Michael as was to bring out of Sicily, and therewith to cross over into Macadamia. So Michael as Lavinus the Vice-Prator was fent; and when he had taken the charge of the floor com

In the end of this year, when a motion was propounded in the Senat-house, as concerning the fetting out of lands unto the old souldiers for recompence of their good service, who, under the conduct and fortunate government of Seipie the Pro-Consul, had prought the war in Africk to an end: the LL enacted a decree, that M. The Roman flage-plaies were that year exhibited with great flate and magnificence melt (umptuoully, by L. Falerius Flacens, and T. Quimius Flaminus, Ediles of the Chair, and for two daies together were represented anew. These Ædiles distributed and divided most faithfully among the people a mighty deal of corn, which Scipio the Pro-Conful had fent out of Affrick, at four Affesthe Modius: whereby they won great love and favour of all men, Alfo the Plebeian plaies werethrice let forth all whole again by the Ædiles of the Commons, L. Apufius Fullo, and Q. Minnius Rufus. This man from his Ædileship stepped to the Practors place. And by occasion of those baies there was a folemn leak telebrated in the honour of Jupiter.

In the 5.4.4 year from the foundation of the City, when P. Sulpitius Galba, and C. Aurelius were Coff, the wair with King Philip began, within four months after peace granted to the Carthaginans. And before all other matters this affair was propounded in the Senate by P. Sulpitius the Coff, upon the Ides of March, the very day on which at that time they used to enter upon the Confulhip. Whereby the Senate it was detreed, Imprimis, That the Confuls should facrifice with greater beafts to what gods themselves thought good, with a solemn prayer in this form: The what over the Senate and people of Rome minded and intended to do, either concerning the affairs of the Common-wealth, or the undertaking and enterprise of this new war, the same might speed well and happily in the end, to the behoof of the people of Rome, their allies, and manuly, the nation of the Latines, Item, That after facrifice and divine prayer they should conflict with the Senat about the Senat change the City, and the government of the Provinces Arther fame.

After that the Consuls had openly pronounced and declared, that the sarrifices were performed rightly and according to order, and that the Gods gave ear unto their prayer, and accepted thereof: and the southly ages and bowell-priers likewise out of their learning made shiwer and thewed, that the inwards of the beasts were as they thould be, and signified

Tribune of the Commons, failed not to fet them one who taking the old course and way of blaming and accusing the nobles, had laid to their charge, that they lowed the feeds of war itill, and ceased not to raise war upon war, to the end, that the commons might never be at rest, and enjoy the repose of peace. The LL, of the Senat took this to the heart, in such fort, that the Tribune was thaken up and much reviled in the Senat-house with most opprobrious and reproachfull terms; and every mandid his pate to encourage the Conful to publish a new affembly and scrutiny, for the proposing of the same bill; to chastise and rebuke the sloath and idleness of the people; yea, I and to open and shew unto them what great damage and toss, how much shame and dilworship they should incur by these delaies before the war began. Then the Conful having affembled the people for this purpose in May field, before that he cited the Centuries to give their voices, called them all together and made a speech unto them in this wile. "It seemeth (quoth he) that you are "ignorant, my Masters and Citizens of Rome, that the matter put to question is not, whether ve "would have war or peace, (for Philip will not permit that to be at your disposition and pleasure, "who already prepareth mortail war both by fea and land but whether ye would rather choose to transport the legions into Macedony, or receive your enemy here within Italy, And what difefference there is between the one and, the other, you have had inflicient proof and experience "(if ever at any time before) even in this last war, especially with the Carthaginians, For who is he K "that maketh doubt; but if we had with speed relieved the Saguntins befreged, who fled unto us "for help, and earneftly craved for our protection, like as our incestors and progenitors in due crime affifted the Mamertins; we should have turned the whole violence and force of the war " into Spain, which by our long driving off & lingring delaies we entertained in Italy, to our great colors and grievous calamity. Neitherneed we to doubt of this, but that we have hithertoffeid es Philip in Macedony, (who without question had combined with Annibal by means of letters and entercourse of Embassadors, for to have passed over into Italy before this time) only by "fending of Levinus with a fleet, to begin with him at home, and to make war in his ownking-"dom. Defer we then to do that now, when Annibal is chased out of Italy and the Carthagini-" ans defeated; which then we did, when we had the same Annibal our enemy within Italy? Go L e we onfill and fuffer the King by winning the City of Athens (like as we permitted Annibatby forcing of Saguntum) to try and see our slackness and cowardise: we shall have him I warrant co you arrived in Italy, not at five months end, as Annibal was after his departure from Saguntum; or but within five daies, after he is dilanchored once & under fail from Corinth, Set case ve will not compare Philip with Annibal, no, nor the Macedonians with the Carthaginians; yet I am fure we will make them matches, and equall with King Pyrrhus: fo far forth I fay, as one man excelleth another in valour, and one nation jurpaffeth another in power. Epirus hath never been accounce ted nor is at this day, but the smallest appendant to the kingdom of Macedony, and of least imcontance. But as for Philip, the whole and entire feignory of Peloponnesus is under him and Lord "he is of Argos it self, a City nobled as well by the death of Pyrrhus, as the ancient name and re-M conown that goeth of it. Compare now again the times of our state. How much sourished Italyin c' thole daies more than now? Our affairs were then much more found and unfoiled: our Caper tains fafe our armies all, so many as they were, untainted; whom the Carthaginian wars afterward confumed: yet as puissant and great as we were, Pyrrhus affaied us, he put us to trouble and . forrow enough, yea, and came intrain of victory to shake our free hold, even wel-near to the Cie tv of Rome. So as not only the Tarentins, and all that tract of Italy, which they call the greater "Greece banded with him in such fort, as a man would have thought they had followed the very Ianguage and those of their name: but the Lucans also and the Brutians, yea, and the Sampits re-" volted from us, and rebelled. And are ye of beliefe that these will be quiet and remain in loyalty and obedience, if Philip once were passed over into Italy? yes mary will they there is no questi- N "on: for they stood fast afterwards, and continued true in the Punick war, Nay, nay, never make er reckoning that these States will not revolt from us so long as they know any one unto whom they may turn and range themselves. If ye had thought much of it, and been loath to pass over "into Affrick in truth at this day ye should have had Annibal and the Carthaginians your enemies "(fill in Italy, Let Macedony therefore be the feat of war rather than Italy: let our enemies Cities "and lands be destroyed with fire and sword. We have found well by good experience that our "fortune is better, and our forces wore puissant abroad in forrain parts, than at home in our own "Country, Go to therefore in the name of God to the Scrutiny and give your voyces; and those "things that the LL of the Senat have devised to do, grant ye the same, and yield your assent. Ye " have not only the Conful author of this advice and counfel, but alfo the immortal gods (who as o "I offered acrifice and prayed devously unto them, that this war might redound to the good and benefic of my felf, of the Senat, of you, of our allies, of the Latine nation, and finally of our armies "and armadoes) have vouch fafed meall the figns and tokens of comfort and joy, and affored me of that all shall be well, and according to our hearts defire. This Oration of his once ended, they went presently to deliver up their voices, and gave * affirmatively for the war, & suffered it to pass according as he had propounded. Then by an order from the Senat there was a folemn supplication

A three daies proclaimed and in all Churches and Chappels, and before every firine & altar the gods were praied theo, that the war (which the people had allowed of) against K. Philip might be wet atchieved, and have an happy end, Moreover, the Conful Sulpina. Conferred with the heralds. and asked their advice, Whether they would ordain, that the war to be denounced against King Philip should be intimated to himself in person; or thought it sufficient to be proclaimed within the confines of his dominion, at the next frontier rown of all where he kept a garrison and guard: mey pronounced again, That it mattered not, but the Conful frould please himself, and do full well in the one and the other. Then the Conful was permitted by the LL, of the Senat to chuse whom he would, to he were not a Senator, for to fend as a messenger or pursevant of arms, to give the King defiance, and to publish war. After this it was debated in Council, how the armies should B be disposed as well of Consuls as Practors. The Consuls were commanded to enroll two legions, and to dicharge and caffe the old armies. Suppting, who by a decree was to manage this new was of fogreat name and confequence, was allowed to take with him out of that army which Supple the Vice-Conful had brought out of Affrick, as many voluntaries as he could procure : but in no cafe to urge any old fouldier against his will. Alford was decreed, that the Conful should allow unto the Pratois L. Furius Purpureo, and Quintus Minutius Rufus 5000 men apeece of theaffociass of the Latine nation: whom they should employ, the one in the Province of Gallia, and the other in the Brutians country to defend those parts and keep them in obedience. Q. Fulvins Gillo was himself likewise commanded to chuse out of that army which P. Elius the Consul commanded, as many as had ferved fewelf years; untill he made up the number of 5000 also of the allies & C Latines; which should be a garrison to keep in order and safety the Province of Sicily, M.Valerius Falto, Prætor the year before, and L. deputy of the Province of Campan, had his Commission figured anew, to continue for the term of one year longer, and as Vice-Prætor to pals over into Sardinia, with direction to chule out of the army there 5000 of the allies and Latines, such as had ferved least time. And the Confuls were commanded to take up two legions of Citizens, which might be lent to any place, as need should require, confidering that many nations in Italy tainted and infected with the fellowship and company of the Carthaginians during the wars and ever fince, were swelled with anger and despite against the Romans. Thus the Common-weal for that year was to use the employment of fix Roman Legions.

Amidit these preparations for war, there arrived Embassiadors from K. Ptolomeus, giving intelligence, that the Athenians had craved aid of their King and Matter, against Philip. And although they were confederate as well with him as the Romans, yet the King would fend into Greece neither a fleet of ships, not an army of men, defensive, or offensive to any, but by authority and confent of the people of Rome. In case therefore the Romans were resolved, and sufficient withall of themselves to desend their allies, he would be willing to sit still and take his repose at home. Qtherwise; if the Romans were rather disposed to rest and take their ease, he would himself be well content to fend such forces to the aid of the Athenians, as should defend them easily against all the power of Philip. The Senat returned great thanks unto the King, with this answer, That the people of Rome were purposed to protect their own allies: but if during this war they stood in need, upon any occurrence that might happen, they would give knowledge thereof to the King: as E being affured and making full account that all the puiffance and wealth of his kingdom was a fure propand trufty pillar of their State and Common-wealth. This done, by order from the Senat the Embassadors had given them for a reward * five thousand Asses apiece. Now whiles the Consuls *15 Litath, were busie in taking musters, and providing all things meet for the war; the City very devout and 64.0cm. given much to religion, in the beginnings especially of all new wars, after they had performed their supplications aforesaid, and done their devotions at every altar and shrine : because nothing might be for-let and left out, that at any time heretofore had been done; ordained that the Cof. unto whom the Province of Macedony fell, should vow solemnly to exhibit to the honour of 74piter, the great games and plaies, and a rich present beside. But Licinius the High Priest staid this publike vow for the time that it went not forward, alledging that it was not lawful to make a vow F of an uncertain sum of money not determined: & if such money might not serve for the use of war, it ought presently to be set by and laid up safe, and not be mingled and shuffled with other monies: and unless that were duly done the vow could not be paid and performed according to the order of holy rites. Albeit the thing it felf and the person of the man that moved this scruple, touched and troubled them much, yet they would needs that the Conful should propound the marter to the colledge of the Priests and Bishops, to know their resolution, whether a vow might nor directly be made of an uncertain peece of money. The Bishops set down their opinion and judgment, that it might be well enough, yea, and better than otherwise. Whereupon the Consul pronounced the vow according to the very same form of words (as the High Priest endited and spake before him) which aforetime they were wont to use, in making the quinquennal vows from five G years to five: fave only thus much, that he vowed and promifed to represent the plaies, and to present oblations unto Jupiter, amounting to such a sum of money, as the Senat should set down when the vow was to be performed. So many times before had the great games been vowed, and a determinate fum of money ever assigned: but these were the first that were not limited within any certain stint and compass.

comples for the Infubrians, the Cenomans and Bois, having follicited and raifed up by way of infurunnitistof the important and either states of Legaria, under the conduct of Andreas the Carthaginan, who in those parts stad behind with the remain of Assertad his army agestic zed of Placenta and after they had lacked the City, and for very dipitious anger burntagear part of it-leaving hardly two thouland persons of all forts; which amide the fire and ruins thereof chanced to fave themselves crossed the river Pe, and advanced forward to the spoil and pillage of chanced to tave members represented that Colony, having heard of the micro and applies of Cremens. But the inhabitants of that Colony, having heard of the microy and calamity being montheir neighbour-City, had some respit and time to thus their gates, and to better their guards upon the walls: to as, they should relativiste the first besigned of eyer they were forced, and might be able to dispatch melengers unto the people of Rems. L. Rurius Ruppurco was governor of that Province for the time: who having by order from the Senat discharged all the rest of I the army but only five thousand of allies and those Latines, abode with that power in the next country to that Province, about Ariminum, He then addressed his letters unto the Senat, signifying in how bad terms the province flood, namely, that of thole two Colonies, which all the time of the Punick war had escaped those great florms and tempests of troubles, the one was wonby the enemies and put to the jaccage, the other now befieged, and at hand to be loft: neither would his forces be sufficient and able to help the diffressed Cremonians, unless he should wilfully cast away five thouland allies, and expose them as a prey unto forty thouland of the enemies (for fo many they were firong to have their throats cut, and to be hewn in peeces; and by in great a lois and overthrow of his, to give more heart and conrage to the enemies, who are now in their ruff. and puffed up with pride for the ruin of one Roman Colony already. Upon the reading of these K letters, there went forth a decree from the LL, of the Senat, that C. Anrelius the Conful should fend out precepts for the army to be ready, at Ariminum, that very day, on which he appointed them to the Rendezvouz in Hetruria: and that either himself in his own person, if it might thank with the good of the State, would go with a power to suppress these French commotions, or elie write to L. Furius the Przetor, that when the Roman Legions presented themselves unto him our of Hetruria, he should send in their stead his own five thousand allies for the guard of Hetruria in the mean time, and make a journey himself in person to raile the siege before Cremona, and to fet the Colony free that now was beleaguered. They thought good belides to dispatch Embasiadors into Affrick, who should go to Carthage, and afterwards to Majanifa in Numida. To Carthage, for to intimate up to them, That Amilear, a Citizen of theirs, left behind in France, (and L whether he were of the army of Afdrubal before or afterwards of Mago, they knew not for certain) waged war there against the covenants in the League contained: that he had affembled certain forces of French and Ligurians, to enter into arms against the people of Romes and therefore, if they had any love to entertain peace, they should call him home, and deliver him to the people of Rome, Over and besides they had in commission to give them to understand, that delivery was not yet made of all the runnagate rebels, but many of them, by report, were retired to Carthare, and there went up and down, and converted openly; which perfons were, after diligent fearch made to be attached and apprehended, that they might, according to the tenor of the accord be fent home again, and delivered into the hands of the Romans. And thus much concerning their meffage to the Carthaginians. Now they had in charge besides to congratulate with Masanista, M and to declare what joy they took in his behalf namely, for that he had not only recovered the inheritance of his fatherskingdom, but also enlarged his dominion, by conquest of the most flourithing part of the Realm of Syphax. Moreover, commanded they were to fignific unto him that they had undertaken to war upon King Philip because he had befriended and aided the Carthaginians ; and by offering and doing wrong to the friends of the people of Rome, even at what time as all Italy was full of troubles and wars, enforced and put them to it, forto fend their armies and their armadoes into Greece, and so by dismembring and dividing their forces into fundry places, was the principall cause that they were so late ere they passed over into Affrick; requesting him for the maintenance of this war, to lend over certain aids of Numidian horiemen. These Orators had great gifts and honourable prefents given them for to carry unto the King to wit, divers pee- N ces of pl. te both of gold and filver, a purple robe of State, with a rich cassock or coat wrought in palm-tree work with a royall Scepter of Ivory, also a robe embroydered before with purple, with an Ivory chair of state, Last of all they are willed to make promise unto the King, that if be could think upon any thing needfull and expedient either to establish his kingdom, or to advance his royall estate, the people of Rome would endeavour respectively for his good demerits to compais the same to the uttermost of their power.

There arrived also about that time Embassadors from Vermina the son of Syphax, and presented themselves unto the Senat, excusing the errour, and pretending the youth of the Prince clesring him of all fault, and laying the wholeblame upon the fraud and treachery of the Carthaginians, promiting for their King and Master in this wife, That like as Mafaniffa of a professed enemy O was become a tworn friend to the Romans, even to would Vermina do his belt, and strain himself. that in all offices of friendship toward the people of Roma, neither Majaniff a, nor any other, should furpals and go beyond him; and making petition in his name, that the Senat would vouchtafe to give him thetitles of King, of Allyand Friend unto the Romans. These Orators had this fortheir answer. That not only Syphax, his father before him, of a confederate friend, suddenly without any cause at all proved an enemy to the people of Rome; but also himself had practised already in his

A young years, and laid the first ground of his warfare in annoying and troubling the Romans be war; and therefore he was to feek pardon and crave peace at their hands, before he might he lat verted by them with the terms of King, of Ally, and Friends for the honour of that Hile the broken ple of Rome were wont to vouchfafero none, but those Kings only who had deserved figuriaria well of them. Mary there should be certain Roman Leguism Affrick, unto whom the Songe would give order to minifer and render unto Vermina certain conditions of peace according to a large and absolute commission that they had from the people of Rome, To do what they though good. And in cale the King milliked ought in those capitulations, and were delifousto have any article added, put out, or sitered, he must reconfle agam to the Senat, and deniated the same 196 there were Legats or Commissioners sent into Affrick with such a Commission above said, mame-B ly, C. Terentius Varro, Sp. Lucretius, and Cn. Ottavius, and each of them had a galleace directed with five rows of oars.

After this were the letters read of Q. Minntins Prator in the Province of the Brutii, importing thus much, That the confectated money of Proferpina at Locri, was by night flold out of her treatrus much; I have the should do the deed, they had no presumptions to give light and lead them directly. The Senat took the matter in very ill part, and grieved exceedingly, That sacrilegious menfell fill to Church-robbing, and would not give over: and that the late and fresh example of Pleminius (so notorius as well for the hainous fact as the fearful punishment) was not able to test rifie them and give them warning. So C. Aurelius the Cof. was enjoyeed to write unto the Prator into the Brutians country, to this effect: That it was the Senats pleasure; that due enquiry and

C examination should be had of the Treasury thus robbed after the same precedent and course that M. Fomponins the Prætor took three years before. And look what money could be found. He should be laid up duly in the place; and what was not forth-coming, it should be supplied and made good again, Alfo (if he thought meet) that thereshould be tertain purgatory facrifices are cording as the Bilhops before ordained in the like case, for the expistion and satisfaction of the violating and defiling of the Temple, Moreover, there chanced about the lame time divers proble gious tokens from many places to be reported. In the Lucans country the rumor and voice went, that the welkin was on fire; and at Probenum, while the sky was bright and fair, the form appeared red all day long. At Lanuvium, in the Temple of Juno Sofpica, there was heard in the night-feason a mighty great noile. Nay, and more than this, in shidry places (as men say) were might ny monitrous and strange births feen. In the Sabins country one child was born, and no man knew what to make of it, male or female: and another likewife was found of fixteen years of age, a very Hermaphrodite of doubtfull fex between both. At Fraffio there was a lamb yeared with a fwines head : and at Sinue fa a low farrowed a pig with the head of a man, In the Pricans country there was foled upon the common ground a cole with five feet. All these monsters were ngly to fee and abominable, and holden for great defects and errors of nature working (trangely out of kind. Burabove all others, those births both male and temale, (or rather neuter) were most abhorred and deteffed, and order was given prefently, that they should be cast into the sea; even as of late daies when C. Claudius and M. Livius were Confuls the like deformed monfler was thit her had away and drowned. Nevertheless the Decemvirs were commanded to turn over and peruse

E the books of Sibylla, to know what such prodigious monsters might portend : who by their learning and out of thosebooks, gave direction to make the fame facrifices which last of all for the like uncouth fights were made. Moreover, they gave commandment, that certain hymnis and fongs should be chanted throughout the City by three severall quires, of nine virgins in every one; and an oblation to be offered by them with all devotion to queen Juno, C. Aurelian the Confol canfed all this to be performed according to the order and direction of the Decemvirs. And as in our fathers daies Livin composed the ditty of the hymn, fo at that time P. Licinius Tegula framed and fet down a form of fong which they could fing. Thus when all things were expiate, and faisfaction made accordingly for the appearing of the wrath of the gods, (for even at Locrialio the facriledge was found out by Q. Minuius, and the money milling was railed out of F the goods of theoffenders and guilty perions, and bestowed there again in the treasury) as the Confuls were minded to take their journey into their Provinces, there repaired many private Citizens unto the Senat, unto whom the third payment was due that year for the loan of money, which in the time of M. Valerius and M. Claudius Confuls they had lent out and disburfed, because that the Comiuls had made them answer, That the Rock of the City Chamber was hardly able to defray the charges of a new war, which required maintenance of a mighty Navy and of puffant armies, and therefore flatly denied them, and faid, That they had not wherewith to fatisfie and make prefent payment. The Senat could not endure that they should have this occasion to make complaint; confidering, that if the Common-wealth would fill employ the money upon the Macedonian war also, which was granted in loan for the Punick war,

G this would be the end of it, that (one war following thus in the neck of another) their own money which was lent upon's cuttesse and benevolence out of their private puries, should be little better than confiscate for some forfeiture, and fall to the Exchequer and common Cheft of the City. These private persons demanding nothing but reason and right, and the City withall not able to dicharge her debt, the Lords fet down a middle and indifferent course between honefly and profit; and that was this: That for almuch as many of these men said, that the City had much land upon fale, and they were to buy and make purchase, therefore the common

grounds lying and being withinfify miles of Rome every way, should be granted unto them in see H is man, and the Consuls to set down an estimate of their value and worth, and chargeshem with a chief rent or tribute of three farthings an acre by the year, to tellific only that they were the Cicies lands; to the end that if any manhereafter (when the City should be aforehand and in case to repay the former debt) were desirous to have money rather than land, he should restore the lands and possessions again into the Cities hands and receive his money. These private Citizens (who were the forefaid creditors) accepted gladly of this offer and condition. And hereupon this land was called by the name of Trientius and Tributus, because it was set out and granted in lieu of a third part of the lone mony. Then P. Sulptim after he had pronounced his vows abovefaid in the Capitoll, and departed out of the City in his coat of arms, with the Listors and Uthers afore him, arrived at Brundusium; and so with the old voluntary souldiers drawn out of B the army that was returned from Affrick, (whom he had enrolled into legions) and thips choien out of the fleet of Cornelius the Conful; he loofed from Brundusium, and the next day after landed in Macedonia: where attended him the Embassadors of the Athenians; who humbly be-Sought him to deliver them from the fiege that invested their City, So C. Clan. Cento was incontinently fent to Athens, furnished with twenty long thips of war, and a ftrength of men for the King himself in person belieged not Athens, but even then made hot affault upon the town Abraus, as having already given proof of his forces in fea-fight, both with the Rhodians and Kin Artalus, and in neither battell had good fucces. But besides the ordinary stoutness and pride engrassed in him by nature, he was aloft now and looked high, by reason of the alliance made between him and Anisochus King of Syria, with whom he had parted the riches and Realm of Agyps, unto K which they both appired, upon the news they heard of the death of Ptolomens. Now the Atherians had drawn upon themselves the war against King Philip, upon a small occasion and of no importance; who of all their ancient estate and glory, retain nothing else but great heart and hauty spirit. It fortuned that two young men of Acarnania, who had taken no orders and were not confectate, entred among the other multitude into the Temple of Geres, in the time of the feaftivall daies, and celebration of facrifices to that goddels belonging: and being altogether ignorant in the custome of that solemnity and religion, and asking some foolish absurd questions, nothing fit for that time or place, were foon bewrayed by their speech and language: who being convented before the Prelates of the laid Temple, notwithstanding it was evidently proved and known that upon an errour only & overlight, and not for any ill intent they were come into the L Church, yet were they put to death, as fellons, and guilty of some hainous fact in the highest degree. The people of Acarnania complained unto King, Philip and informed him of this villanous persand hostile act by them committed; and obtained a grant from him, that they might be permitted with the aid of the Macedonians, to make war upon the Athenians. This army at first invaded the territories of Ashens, and with fire and sword made waste & havock of all, and so with a rich booty of all forts returned into Acarnania, These were the first quarrels on both sides that firred coals and kindled fire between them. Afterwards was defiance given, and open war proclaimed by the general decrees of both States. For when King Attalus and the Rhodians pursued after Philip, as he retired into Macedany, and were come as far as Agina then the faid King paffed over to Presum for to renew and confirm the league with the Athenians, Against his coming M the whole City went forth with their wives and children to meet him on the way: the Clergy with their rich vestments and goodly ornaments were ready to receive him as he entred the City: the very gods themselves in a manner abandoned their shrines to give him entertainment. Immediatly was the people summoned to a generall affembly, that the King might deliver his mind before them all: but afterwards,uponmore fage advice, it was thought to fland better with the honour and Majefly of a Prince, that he should set down in writing what he thought good, rather than in open place either to blush himself in recounting his favors and good turns done unto the City, or in hearing the acclamations of the multitude in token of joy, to be abashed and ashamed of their gross and unmeasurable flattery. But in his letters which he sent unto the assembly, and were there openly read and published, first he made a rehearfall of the benefits that this con- N federate City had received at his hands. Secondly, he discoursed of the worthy exploits which he had performed against Philip. And finally he knit up all with an exhortation, that whiles they had himself, the Rhodians, and especially the Romans to friend them, they should put themselves in arms and begin war; as who if they now forflowed the enterprise, and let flip the present opportunity, should hereafter seek in vain to find it, which once they had so retchlesty lost. Then had the Rhodian Embassadors audience given them, who lately had done the Athenians a great pleafure, in recovering and fending home unto Athens four long foifts, which newly had been boorded and taken by the Macedonians. Hereupon with generall accord they decreed to denounce and wage war against King Philip. But first they did King Attalus incredible honour beyond all measure and then likewile to the Rhodians. Then and never before there was some speech mo-O ved of adjoyning unto the ten ancient tribes, one other tribe, which of the Kings name should be called Attalia, Unto the City of the Rhodians they gave in token of vertue, a Crown of beaten gold. And like as beforetime the men of Rhodes had granted free Burgeofie of their City to the Athenians, so they of Athens now endured the Rhodians with their liberties and franchises. This Agean sea,or done, K. Assalus returned to his fleet in the rode of Agina. The Rhodians then weighed anchor, and from Egina failed to * Cea. From whence along the * Islands, they passed to the Rhodes:

B and in the end let the Romans go away with the honour, both of managing and also of finishing S Gengii, the fame. Philip carried with him yet a more princely mind and Kingly courage: who, although s. Georges arm. he was not able to match and make his part good fo much as with Attalia and the Rhodians his enemies, yet was he nothing at all danted with the thundring threats of the Roman war; but fent Philocles, a Captain of his, with a power of two thousand foot and two hundred horse, to invade and spoil the territory of the Athenians, committed his Atmado to the charge of Harneliinvade and ipon the territory of the American and himself in person marched by land thirder with another regiment of two thouland footmen lightly appointed, and two hundred men of arms. Maronea he Marolia. forced at the first assault. But as for Anu, after he had with much labour and travell laid seee thereto a long time, in the end he was Master thereof, through the treason of Ganymedes, deputed C L. Governor there for King Ptolomaus. After this he furprifed and won other Caftles, as Copfela, Dorifcon, and Serrheum. From thence he advanced forward to Cherfonefus, where he gained Eleas and Alopeconnesus, which willingly surrendred : Callipolis also and Madytos, with some other peeces of bale account and reckoning. But the Abydens shurtheir gates against the King, and would not fuffer (o much as his Embaffadors to fet foot within their Cities. There lay Philip a long time before the town and beleaguered it: and furely had not Attalus and the Rhodians foreflacked the time, it might have been faved and the fiege raised. Attalus sent thither three hundred souldiers and no more to lie in garrison, and the Rhodians one galley only with sour banks of oars out of the navy when it rode at Tenedos. And afterwards when as Attalus himself was thither come, at what time as the townsmen could hardly fiold out any longer against the siege, he made

Define a firew only near at hand of some help? other relief would he afford none to his allies either by land or fea. The Abydens at first planted their engins and artillery along the walls, and with that from thence not only distressed their enemies, and kept them from approach and entrance, but also annoyed them as they lay in harbons with their ships: but afterwards, seeing part of their walls ruinate and laid open 3 and perceiving besides that the enemies had undermined and were come under the ground as far as the inner countermure, which the inhabitants in great haste had railed within, forthwith they sent Embassadors to the King to treat and article about fome conditions for delivering up the City. The townsmen capitulated and demanded, that the Rhodian Galley aforesaid, with all her mariners, and the garrison also of King Attalus, might be fent away in fafety, and themselves permitted to depart the town every one with a single fuit only of apparel. But Philip made answer again that they had no peace for them at all, unless they would quit the place, and simply commit themselves unto his mercy. This Embassage related unto them, fet them in such an heat and choler, that partly for spight and indignation, and partly upon despair, they sell into the like rage that the Saguntins did in times past. All the dames and wives of the City they commanded to be shut up within the Temple of Diana: their young boies and maidens that were free-born, the sucking babes, together with their nurses, they caused to be bestowed within the common place of publike exercise: their gold and silver they took order to be brought into the market place: their rich attire, their coffly apparell and furniture, to be cast into the two Galleys, the one of Rhodes, and the other of Cyzicum, which rid in the haven: and last of all, that their Priests should be brought forth with their heasts for facti-

F fice and alters erected in the midft of the place. There first were certainmen chosen of purpose: who so soon as they perceived the battaillon of their countrimen defeated and slain, fighting before the breaches of the wall, immediatly should run upon their wives and children, and kill them without mercy, cast away into the sea their gold and silver, and all the surniture abovesaid that was in the Galleys, and fet the edifices and houses afire, as well publike as private, in as many places as possibly they could. For the performing and execution of these premises, they were bound by an oath ministred unto them; the form whereof, with a cursed malediction thereto annexed, they pronounced word for word from the Priests mouth. Then, as many as were of lawfull age to bear arms, sware likewise. That not one of them would depart out of the battellalive, but with victory. Thus remembring the oath they had taken, and how they called the gods to

G wines, they fought to resolutely, that whereas the night would have parted the combate, the King terrified with their furious rage, first gave over the conflict. The chief and principall men of the City, whose charge was to play the more cruell and horrible part in this tragicall act, seeing there remained but few alive after this skirmift; and those grievously wounded and tired out of heart for wearines; the next morning early by day-break fest sheir Priests with their infules and veiles of peace, to render the City unto Philip. Before the town was fully yielded, M. Amyliss the youngest of those three Roman Embassadors which were sent to Alexandria, hearing of the fraight fiegs of the Abydens came by the confent of the other two unto Philip, Whese he laid H open thing grievasces, and made complaint. That he hadwared upon Atrohus and the Rhedians, and namely even them befored and admined Abyden most forcibly. And when the Kingsapiwered that hands and the Rhedians withour, just cause on his part officed, began full to model and trouble him. What! (quoth Amyling again) were you medicad not probled first by the abydens and the first by the abydens. trouble nim, what tequine companies to be told the truth to plainty, thinking this seigender of his more bold and malapest than to be offered to a King, Your youthing age, quoth he, & fair face, wand above all the Roman name maketh you hardy and and actions, But I would advise you all, "first to remember your covenants, and to entertain peace with me. For in case ye once begin "with me, and put me to it : I do you understand, that I also am fully resolved to make you feel "the finart, and know, that the realm and nation of the Macedonians is no less renowned for fears I of arms than the Romans. Philip having difmiffed the embaffador, and feized upon all the cold and filver that lay on an heap together, loft all the booty of men of quality that might have vielded him a round ranform. For the multitude of common people fell into such a fit of rage and madness, that all of a sudden they imagined those who let their lives in the conflict were betrayed: and so casting one in anothers teeth their perjury, and charging the Priests especially that they were softworn in delivering them alive unto the enemy whom they had devoted and appointed to death; they ran at once from all parts to the pitifull massacre of their own wives and children: and when they had so done, they made no more ado, but by fire, by sword, by drowning, hangging, and one way or other, they wrought a quick dispatch and clean riddance of themselves also. The King aftonied to see them thus horn-mad, staid the bloudy his own fouldiers, faying, that K he would allow the Abydens three daies to dye in. During which term of time the conquered Abydens exercifed more fearful crueky upon their own persons than ever the conquerors would have put in practice in the height of their heat and sholerick fury. Infomuch as there was not one of them came alive into the enemies hands; but such as either fast tied with bonds, or otherwise by fome forcible means were staid from being their own hangmen, and the butchers of their proper bodies. Philip after he had placed a garrison at " Ahydus returned into his own Realm. Now when this milerable calamity of the Abydens had fleshed Philip to enterprise war against the Romans like as Annibal afore him took heart by the worull destruction of Saguntum to do the semblable: behold, he was encountred with poffs that brought news, how the Conful was in Entras already, and had withdeawn his land-forces to Apolloma, and bestowed his servitors at sea in Cor-L. erra, there to winter.

In this while the Embassadors who ware sent into Affrica had their dispatch and this answer from the Carthaginian, First, as touching Amiscar the Generall of the army and forces in France. they could do no more but banish his person, and confiscat his goods. Then concerning the fueitive traitors and rebels which were run from the Romans, they had fent home again unto them as many as they could learch out and come by : and to that purpose they would address Embasiadors themselves unto the Romans, to satisfie the Senat in that behalf. And presently they sentto Rome two hundred thouland Modii of wheat, and other two hundred thouland into Macedan to the army there. From thence the Roman Embaffadors went forward to the King in Numidia. To King Masaniffa they delivered the presents which the Romans sent; and declared unto him M their commission; at whose hands they received a thousand Numidian horse, whereas he offered them two thousand: himself took order for their embarking, and so dispatched them into Macedans, with provision of two hundred thousand * measures of wheat, and as many of barley. A third Embassage they had to Vermina, who met the Embassadors as far as the utmost marches of his Realm, and to their disposition and discretion referred the drawing and penning of all conditions of peace as they would themselves: saying withall, that he held any peace whatsoever, that he should have with the people of Rome for good and just. So there were presented unto him certain articles and conditions of peace, and for the ratilying thereof he was enjoyeed to fend his Embaffadors to Rame.

Much about the very same time L. Cornelius Lentulus the Vice-Prator returned out of Spain: N who having declared in the Senat his valiant and fortunate exploits, that for many years together he hadatchieved in Spain; and in confideration thereof, demanded that it might be lawfull for him to enter the City in triumph: the Senat judged that his noble acts deferved no less thanhe fued for: but they had no such precedent from their ancestors, that he should be allowed to triumph, who had warred, neither as Dictator, nor Conful, nor Prator : and as for Lengulus, in qualitwof Vice-Preser only, and not of Conful or Prestor he took upon him the charge of the Province of Spain. Howheit, in the end they came down to this point, that he should ride into the City on hosseback as Ovant, But T. Sempronius Longus a Tribune of the Com, interposed his negative alledging that they had as little example to fnew for that; and no prachice or custome at all of their ancient predecessors. But in fine the Tribune gave place to the generall accord of the LL, O and was content to be over-ruled. So after the order fet down by the Senat, L. Lentules entred thathe ounce. Rome in that folemnity and pomp before-named. He presented in shew of the pillage that he had got, 44000 pound weight of filver, 2450 pound weight of gold. To his fouldiers he diffributed out of the spail * 1 so Affes speece.

New was the army of the Conful translated already from Arminut to Arminum, and five thouland Latine allies were passed out of France into Etrmia, Therefore L. Furius departed from

A Ariminum, made haste by taking great journeyes to come against the Gauls, who then laid siege to Cremona, and encamped within a mile and an half from the enemy. Means and opportunity he had to do a notable exploit, and win a good hand of the enemies, if immediatly upon his first coming he might have affailed their Camp: for they wandred to and fro in cattering wife up and down the country a forraging, and had left no sufficient guard for the detence of their Camp. But he feared greatly that his fouldiers were weary and tired: because the companies marched apace thither in exceeding great hafte. Howbeir the Gauls being called back by the hooping and hollowing of their fellows, let go their booty which they had in manner as good as in their hands. and returned to the Camp, and the morrow after ranged themselves in battell array. The Romans were not behind for their parts, albeit they had hardly time enough to let themselves in order, B the enemies ran fo fuddenly, and made fuch hafte to fight. The right wing (for the army of the allies was divided into wings) was placed in the vanguard: the two Roman legions in the rereward; M. Furius led the right wing, M. Cecilius had the conduct of the legions; and L. Villerius Flacous (all three Lieutenants) commanded the Cavalry. The Prator kept with him two Lieutenants, Cn. Lectorius, and P. Titinius, by whole means he might look about from every part, and be ready to oppose himself against al sudden attempts whatsoever of the enemies. At the first, the Gauls hoped that with their numbers they should be able to tread down and trample under their feet that right wing of allies which was in the forefront: and to that effect they reduced their multitudes into one place, and charged upon it with all their might and main together. But feeing that enterprise sped not well, they endeavoured to environ the corners and sides, and to compais C the enemies round about: which they thought they might foon do, being so many as they were in comparison of so few: which when the Prætor perceived, to the end that he also might spread ont his batteillons at large, he displaied the two legions in the rereward, so as he compassed on both hands that wing which fought in the vanguard and therewith vowed two Chappels to 74-viter, if that day he might be so fortunate as to vanquish his enemies. To L. Valerius he gave direction, that of one fide he should with the Cavalry of the two legions, and on the other fide with the horse belonging to the allies charge upon the wings of the enemies, and not suffer them in any case to enclose the battell about. Herewithall himself also, espying the midle battaillon of the Gauls to be but thin, by reason they were stretched out from thence to the corners and points of each hand, commanded his fouldiers to keep close together, to advance forward and break D through their ranks. So were the wings of the Gauls by the horsemen discomfitted, and they in the midst repulsed back & chased by the footmen : and when the enemies thus at once on every hand were beaten down and killed they shewed their backs, and fled as fast as they could to the camp.

The horsepursued them in the rout and chase; and anon the legionary sootmen made after also, and gave an affault upon their Camp. Thereescaped from thence not all out fix thousand: flain there were and taken prisoners above 35000, with seventy banners and entigns, and more than two hundred French wagons, charged and laden with much pillage. In this conflict, Amilear the Generall of the Carthaginians loft his life, and three Noblemen of the French, Leaders of mark and name. The Placentine captives, to the number of two thousand men offree condition, were delivered again to them of their own Colony. This was a goodly victory; and upon the letters E which came with tidings thereof to Rome, received there with great joy; and ordained it was, that a folenin procession should be held for the space of three daies. Of Romans and allies one with another there died in this battell two thouland : most of them were of that right wing, upon which the enemies in the beginning of the conflict most of all discharged their fury. Albeit the Prator had brought the warro a good pals, and in manner finished it, yet the

Coulut also C: Aurelius, having accomplished his necessary affairs at Rome, made no stay but took his journey into France; and received the victorious army of of the Prztor. The other Conful who came into his Province but a little before the end of Autumn, wintered about Apollonia. The Roman gallies which from the Armado that lay indock at * Coropra, were lent as is afore- * coroba faid to Athens with C. Clandins, were no fooner arrived at Pyreaum, but they mightily comforted F the allies, whole hearts were well-nigh done for neither were there any more inrodes now by land as there were wone to be from Corineh fide by the way of Megara along into their territories: and the men of war and Pyraes thips which from Chateis had made not only the feas dangerous to the Athenians, but also the maritime & sea coasts, dust not now approach nearer than to the cape of Suniam, no, not veneure into the open main lea from our of the straights of Euripus Over and bendes, there came in to them three Rhodian gallies with four banks of oars: there were also three open thips of Athens well rigged and appointed, for to keep the quarters that lay along the river. Chiadian was well appared, and thought he had got enough for the pre-ferr, in cale the City and Territory of Action tright be fufficiently guarded by this fleet. But fee, there preferred unto him an occurrent besides of largreater importance and consequence. Cer-Other papillied persons of Chaleis, expelled from thence by the wrongs and modence of those

G that fided with King Philip, advertised him that the City of Chalois might be easily surprised without any conflict or resistance at all: for not only the Macedonians ranged abroad every where up and down because there were no enemies near at hand to fear; but also the townsmen preluming upon the garrison of the Macedonians, neglected the guard of the City. being discovered (when he was once got past the cape) he kept his seet within the bay sill until I night: and at the shutting in of the evening he weighed anchor and lanched forth, and having a calm fea he arrived before Chalcis a little before the break of day, and prelented his forces against thole parts of the City, that were least peopled: and with the help of tome few fouldiers he fcaled and got the Tower that flood next, with the wall about it, whiles infome places the warders were found afleep ; and in others not at all to befound. Then they advanced forward unto those parts that were more inhabited, and stood thicker with houses; where, after they had killed the guard and broke open a gate, they received into the town all the rest of their fouldiers. Whereupon there was running now on every hand into all parts of the City, and much hurry and confus on; which was the greater, because the enemies had set fire on the houses about the market place. The Kings garners also were of a light fire, together with the arfenall and armory, wherethere t was exceeding flore of provision, of engins, of artillery and other ordnance and infiruments for war. After this they fell to execution and to maffacre in every place, as well those that fled as those that made head; so as they missed not one that was of age meet to bear arms, but either he was killed or put to flight. Sapater likewise the Acarnanian Captain of the garrison was there flain. All the pillage was first brought and piled up together in the common place of the City, and afterwards embarked. The common Goal befides was broke open by the Rhodians, and the priloners and captives let out, whom Philip had there lodged as in a place of fureft guard and cuftody. Then they overthrew the Images and statues of the King, and brake their necks: which done, they founded the retreat, went a shipboord, and returned to Pyreaum, from whence they came. But is the number of Roman fouldiers had been such, that they might have kept Chales still with a gar- K rilon, without quitting and abandoning the defence of Athens, a great matter had been got in the very beginning of the war: to wit, the City of Chalcis and the passage of Euripus, had been taken from the King, For as the narrow pass of Thermopyle stoppeth the waigs into Greece by land lothe freights of Enripus maketh all fure by fea. Philip at that time lay in the City Domerical, where, after he heard the news of the calamity befaln upon a confederate City, albeit now it was too late to help when all was loft; yet because he would be revenged (which is a thing that cometh near to the nature of aid and fuccour) he went forth immediately with five thousand footmen lightly appointed and nimble, and three thousand horsemen, with all the speed and hast he could to reach near unto Chaleis; making full reckoning that the Romans might be surprised on a sudden; but being disappointed of this hope, and thither come where he could see nothing else but L a pirious spectacle of a friend-City half ruinate and still smoaking, and so few people lest alive that they hardly were able to bury their dead, he returned as hastily as he cames and having balled over Enrips at a bridge he lead fireight to Athens by the way of Banin, with a deep perimanon and hope that a like enterprise unto the Romans should have the like issue, And verily be had not missed of the sembly ble estect, correspondent to his designs, but that a certain watchman (one of those whom the Greeks call Hemerodromos that is posts and carriers that in one daies space will run and rid a mighty deal of ground) descried from a watch-tower the Kings troops matching: whereupon he ran out afore and ame to Athens ere midnight. There were they all affeen too, and as retchless as they of Chalcu were a few daies palt, which was the loss of their town. The. Prætor of the Athenians, and Dioxippus the Captain of a regiment of hired firangers and aid-M fouldiers awoke at this fo fearfull and fudden tidings and got up, affembled the fouldiers into the market-flead, and commanded to found alarm from the highest place of the City, that all men might take knowledge that the enemies were near at hand. By which means they ran every man from all parts to the gares and up the walls. Within few hours after, and fomewhat before daylight, he approached the City: and feeing many lights every where, hearing also a noise of peo-ple running to and fro (as in time of such a tumult) he staid his march, and commanded his fouldiers to fit them down and reft themselves, intending to proceed by overt and open forces, since covert and crafty courses sped no better: and so at length he, came before Dipples. This Dipyho is a gate, standing in the very front of the City, greater and wider a great deal than the self. Both within and without that gate are large and broad streets, so that both the inhabitants of within may marshall an army, and lead in battellarray from the common place directly to the gare, and also the enemies without have room at will to conduct a power as well of borie as foot by means of a spacious causey or high-way, which reacheth our almost a mile in length from the forefaid gare and teadeth to the place of exercise or school called Acedemia. Anthis quarter of the City the Athenians, together with the garrifon of Attalus, and the regiment of Diarippus iffeed forth, and encred the causey abovenamed, having first within the gate let their men morder of battell. Which when Philip law, he made full account, That he had his enemies at he would bimilelf to do his pleature with abent, and that now he should have his fill of amastacre and flanghter that he had withed for forlong (for there was not a State or City in all Greace that he maliced more than ohis of Arbens,) And therefore he exhorted and encouraged his foundiers, that o they friend have their eye upon him ever as sheploughe, and know, wellthis, that where the king was there thoughthe barrous and absocts be difficient these thoughthe frength and force or the barrell be and to he det ipurs to his horie, and ran with full correct to charge the enemies. Thus was he not only carried away with hear of the last, the savi had also with a defire of glory's eq Accusing it a goodly thing, and a wanter conding to his great honous, for to be feen fighting the the view of a great attlictude of podplet bachadeakdnoth and filed the bactlements of the walls

A (as is worse) do betted a location specialized. Thus being advanced by both stay being the grain beautilist companies with these few men origins; he food another mide of the grain he beat binsies for all satisfies the shall be shall be such that the satisfies of the satisfies within the walls, Philip to hidded the retreat and pirched his tehrs at Cynologes, where there was a Temple of Bresie, and a school of leathing and a grove standing about it. As for Cynolage and the ichool Lycom, and whatfoever was either religious, or pleafant and delectable about the City, was burned. And not only the edifices, but the repulchres also and monuments of the dead were defaced and call down: in which furious hear of anger, flothing was [pared, were it farred or prophage, without regard of God and mab. The next morrow, when the gates were first kept or propasses, without regard of God and man. The next morrow when the gards were mire that, and afterwards let open again upon it fidding because the gardion of Artaliz curred into the City from: Agma and the Roman from Procedure 19 Mind diffedged and removed back from the City almost three miles, From whence the went to Eleganochoping to furtifie the Temple at C unawares, together with the Town and Castle, which both devironeth the Temple, and also commandeth the same. But when he perceived that the corps of grand was not neglected, and that a fleet besides was coming from Pyrenew to succourthem, he have over this design, and led his army to Megara, and fo streight forward immediately to Corinth; and having intelligence, that the Achazi held a general Diet and counsel at Argus, thinher he came unlooked for of the Achazans, Achaa was taken from Philopamenes and conferred upon Cicliadas, a Captain not to be named and compared with him, and perceiving also that the aids which the Achgans had, were fallen from them and gone, took their vantage, renued the old quartel, and made fresh, war upon them, D waiting the villages and territories of the borderers, yea, and threatning the good Towns and Cities: also. Now whiles they far devising and conferring together what number of fouldiers should be levied and enrolled out of every several state and City, for to withstand this common enemy, Philip franckly promifed to ease them all of that care as touching Nahie and the Lacedemomans and not only to impeach them for spoiling the lands of their Allies, but also to lead his army out of hand into the very territory of Laconica and Sparts, and thicker to turn the whole terror of this war. This kind speech and friendly offer of his, being with a general applause of them all accepted, "Mary, this you must (quoth he) take withal, that good reason it is, whiles "Imy lelf am content to defend and maintain your country by my forces, mine own territories in the mean time be not disfurnished of their garrisons and left naked: and therefore, if ye think E "good, provide me as many fouldiers as may fuffice for the guard of Greum fibelese, and Corinto, goods provide me as many toutilities as may tunice to the goal of that thus making all fire behind me; I may be fecured from danger that way, and with more re-"foliation profecure the war against Nabia and the Lacedemonians. The Achagus imelled him quickly & knew full well, to what end this gracious promile of his and trank offer of aid against the Lacedemonians tended. His only drift was to draw forth of Petoponnylin, the youth and flour of the Atheans as a pledge and fire hoftage for to engage the whole nation to far as they should be interested in the war that he had with the Romans Cyclisdes the Pretor of the Achaens thinking it bootlets, and no good policy, to discover so much and to enforce that point against him, ing it bootels, and no good policy, to discover so much and to enforce that point against him, inserted only this speech and said. First, they bewailed the piteous an Emberapoil comilerable laccage of their territories: neither complained they so much and found them-(felves grieved in that they had fustained harms and suffred hostility from an enemy, (for there be ecerain laws and rights belonging unto war, by settue whereof, to give and take, to fuffer harm and to do harm interchangeably, is an ordinary matter and allowable: As for example, the burning of the control of the c ing of flanding corn in the field, raing and pulling down of houles, harrying and driving of booties both of men and careail, rather pitiful calamities, than shameful indignities to endure.) "But this is the point fay they, and hereof we complain, That he who termed the Romans, this coming from Presum, and a fresh garrison received into the place cansed himperforce to H give over the enterprise. After this the king divided his power, and that one part through guide give over the enterprise. After this the king divided his power, and king on the conduct of Enterprise and himself with the other markhed to Freeham: that whiles Philotes kept the Athenians within the City, by approaching their walls another atting to befiege and affailt it, he might bunnelf with facility win and gain Processes, whereas there was left but a fmall and flight guard. But he found as hot a peece of legyice about the affailing of p. weeken; as before at Eleufine, by reafon of the fame fouldiers in manner, that defended as well the cine as the other. So on a fuddain he departed from Pyreann, & marched directly toward Athens.

From whence he was repulsed and chaled by a fuddain fally both of horse and foot, made from the Breights of the wall half ruinat; which wall fretching out as it were, two arms, joyneth the port Pyreaum to Athens, So he left battering and affaulting the City, and parting again his army with y Philocles, he went out to forrage and spoil the country: and as in his former faccage he exercised himself in demolishing the combs all about the City, so because he would leave nothing entire and fafe, he commanded the chappels of the Gods, which were confectate in every village and hamler, to be pulled down, rafed, and burnt. The countrey of Artica was marvailously beautified and embelished (as it were) with goodly peeces of work in that kind, (by reason as well of the store they had of native marble, as also of their induffrious and excellent workmen) which ministed matter and occasion unto him of this outrage and madness. For not contented and fatisfied with the ruin of the Temples, and cashing down of images, he commanded that the very stones should be broken and batter'd in peeces, that left being whole and found they might ferve to make up and flop the breaches of the mins, w And after that his fell mood and anger was not so much satisfied and satiate, as it wanted matter to work upon in that place, he departed out of his enemies countrey into Beeria, and performed

no other deed in Greece worthy of remembrance.

Sulpition the Conful at that time lay in camp between * Apollonia and * Dyrrachium, neer the river Appen : and having canfed T. Apultius the Lieutenant to come thither, he fent him with part of his forces to wast the borders of his enemies. Apustius after he had forraged the frontiers of Macedon, and forced at the first assault certain holds, as Corrhagum, Gerrhenium, and Orgessum, came with his army before Antipatria, a City feated in the narrow fireights of a certain paffage. And first he called forth the principal and chief citizens to a parly, and assaid to perswade and induce them for to commit themselves under the protection and safeguard of the Romans: but afterwards, feeing they trufted upon their greatnes, the firong walls and fituation of the Town, and therefore made no reckning of his motives, but rejected them, he assailed it by force of arms, and wan it in the end. All that were above fourteen years of age he put to the fword; the whole pillage he deale amongst the souldiers; the walls he rased, and set fire on the Town. The fear of like mifery was the cause that Codrio, a Town of good strength and well fortified, was yeelded to the Romans without affault, or any (word drawn, There he left a garrison; and after that, he forced Ilium, a Town better known for the name that it carieth of the other famous Ilium in Afia, than for any thing elfe. As the Lieutenant returned with a great booty to the Conful, one Athenagoras a Captain under the King, charged upon the tail of the arreergard, difordred the hindmost, and impeached their passage over the river : but the Lieutenant, at their cry and suddain affright rode in M all haft back, capfed them to turn again and make head, fet them in battail ray, and bestowed all their bag and baggage in the mids upon a heap. The Kings fouldiers not able to abide the violence of the Romans, were many of them flain, and more taken prisoners. So the Lieutenant having retired his army in lafety, was immediatly fent back unto the Conful to the Armado.

The war being thus begun, and the exploit of this first expedition happily performed, the Princes, Potentates, and LL, that bordered upon the Macedonians, repaired into the Roman camp, to wit. Plenratus the fon of Scerdiletus, Aminander King of the Athamans; and from Dardania, Bato the fon of Longarus. This Longarus had waged war aforetime in his own name and quarel, with Demerrius the father of this Philip. These States offring and promising their aids unto the Conful, had this answer from him, That for the Dardanians and Plematus, he would use them, N when he entred with an hoft into Macedony, As for Aminander, he gave him in charge the while to follicit the Atolians to war. The Embassadors of Atralus (for they also were come at the same time) he dispatched with this order, That their King should attend the coming of the Roman fleet at Egina, where he wintered; with which and his own jointly together, he should assail Philip at fea, like ashe had done beforetime, Embafiadors also were addressed to the Rhodians, that they like wife should have their hand and be seen in this war. Philip for his part foreslowed not to make preparation (for now by this time was he come into Macedony) and fent with part of his forces for to keep the streights of the passage of Pelagonia, his son Persens, a very child of young years, having chosen certain of his truly friends, to direct and govern his tender age. As for " Sciathus and " Peparethus, two Towns of no small importance he destroied, for fear theene O mies fleet should seize upon them, and with their pullage content and pay themselves. He sent like-wise Einbastadors to the Ecolians (a nation inconstant and unquier by nature) that they should not upon the arrival of the Romans, change their alleageance. Now the Diet or general counted of all the Rates of Etology, which they call Panarolium, was to be held at a certain day appointed. And therefore to prevent and meet with all dangers, both the Kings Embaffadors made had to be prefent thereat; and alfo L. Furins Perpario prefented himfelf there, as lent Embassador from the
